INTRODUCTION

The presidency of Lyndon B. Johnson marked the high point of one of America's greatest reform movements—the struggle for racial equality. After decades of filing petitions in the courts and legislatures, a strategy which had brought significant but limited results, civil rights activists stepped up their protests by daring to confront racial discrimination through marches, boycotts, sit-ins, and other forms of civil disobedience. Shortly after Johnson took office following John F. Kennedy's assassination in November 1963, nonviolent demonstrations helped prick the conscience of the nation and forced the federal government to turn its attention toward eliminating racial segregation. Inheriting from his slain predecessor a strong civil rights bill that was meandering through Congress, Johnson in 1964 directed passage of this landmark measure cracking Jim Crow in public accommodations and education. Over the next four years, the Johnson administration added the 1965 Voting Rights Act and the Fair Housing Law of 1968 to its remarkable legislative achievements. Indeed, by 1969, the "Second Reconstruction" of the South had reached its peak and had reshaped legal and political relations between the races.

Despite his numerous accomplishments, President Johnson left the country bitterly divided. Racial strife spread to the North polarizing whites and blacks, and the war in Vietnam further split the nation along generational, class, and racial lines. The civil rights movement also shattered amidst the turbulence of ghetto uprisings and of demonstrations against the escalating conflict in Southeast Asia. Although the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Urban League rallied behind the President, more militant organizations—the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), and Congress of Racial Equality (CORE)—attacked the administration for meddling in a civil war abroad more aggressively than it fought against racism and poverty at home. Thus an examination of civil rights during the Johnson years is essential for understanding the strengths and weaknesses of twentieth-century liberalism.

Much of the drama, heroism, and torment of the civil rights movement is captured in the millions of pages of documents stored in the Lyndon B. Johnson Presidential Library in Austin. This large volume of archival material amply testifies to the importance of the racial issue during this period. For anyone interested in studying the impact of the civil rights movement on public policy, the Johnson Library contains a treasure trove of records. The purpose of the new microfilm series, Civil Rights during the Johnson Administration, is to gather a selection of major documents from three key types of records at the Johnson Library—White House Central Files and Aides Files, the Administrative History of an important agency, and oral histories—and to make these readily available to scholars everywhere.

A researcher who wants to use the resources of the Johnson Library to study the issue of civil rights should begin with the White House Central Files, which include internal memoranda circulated between the President and his advisors as well as correspondence between the administration and influential individuals and groups outside the White House. These documents are organized into such subjects as "Equality of the Races," "Education," "Employment," "Housing," and "Voting Rights." In a similar fashion, material related to legislation on these issues is catalogued separately. The most important documents in these holdings are labeled with the prefix "EX" (Executive), indicating that they received careful attention by the President's staff and, when appropriate, by the chief executive himself.

In addition to the White House Central Files, valuable information can be gleaned from the White House Aides Files. These are the working papers of presidential assistants, and they include memoranda and reports prepared for the President. The key staff members who counseled Johnson on civil rights were Lee White, Harry McPherson, Joseph Califano, and James Gaither. The files of speechwriters Bill Moyers, Richard Goodwin, and Ben Wattenburg also reveal administration thinking on racial matters, and the papers of Marvin Watson show White House attempts to balance political and moral considerations. Because the President did not write lengthy explanations justifying his actions, preferring instead to conduct business face to face or over the telephone, the files of the aides who were closest to him are crucial for exploring administrative decision making.

The civil rights policies shaped in the White House and enacted by Congress were implemented in the executive branch. These activities are recorded in the Administrative Histories of agencies compiled in the waning months of the Johnson presidency. Consisting of written narratives and appendices of documents, these chronicles are based on sources which usually do not appear in the White House Central Files or Aides Files. Typical of these works is that of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC). Created by the Civil Rights Act of 1964, this agency investigated complaints of job discrimination. Its Administrative History covers the establishment of the organization, its relations with Congress and other federal and state bureaus, and its promotion of job opportunities.

The government's written records tell only part of the civil rights story. The Johnson Library has supplemented these sources with oral history interviews of public officials and private citizens who actively participated in civil rights battles. Transcribed conversations with such administration policymakers as Harry McPherson, Nicholas Katzenbach, Ramsey Clark, Burke Marshall, Louis Martin, and Clifford Alexander offer inside accounts of how the Johnson administration operated. Moreover, interviews with a large number of civil rights advocates—including Charles Evers, James Farmer, Aaron Henry, Clarence Mitchell, Joseph Rauh, Bayard Rustin, Roy Wilkins, Andrew Young, and Whitney Young—portray events from a vantage point away from Washington and provide a measure of Johnson's performance by representatives of the civil rights movement which stirred presidential action in the first place.

Taken together, the selection of written and oral sources from the Johnson Library which are being collected and published for the first time in this series will allow researchers to begin to judge whether Bayard Rustin, a leading black activist, was correct in his assessment that in the area of civil rights "the Johnson Administration had done more . . . than any other administration."

NOTE ON SOURCES

These materials selected for this collection are from the Civil Rights holdings of the Lyndon Baines Johnson Presidential Library, Austin, Texas.

Description of Files: Central Files consists of Subject, Name, Chronological and Confidential Files. Material from the Subject Files related to education has been opened for research. To assist you in using these files there follows an explanation of the "Subject File."

The Subject File: The Subject File is for correspondence pertaining to the functions and operations of the White House, the Federal government, foreign and other governments, and correspondence from private companies or individuals. Material in the Subject File is segregated into two categories, "Executive" and "General."

1. Executive Material: "Executive" material consists of correspondence and other papers of particular importance because of source or nature of content. These generally include incoming letters and other important documents received from agencies, members of Congress, and other prominent correspondents. It may also include such letters even though no action was taken on them at a high level. It includes copies of outgoing letters, memoranda and other documents which were acted upon or brought to the attention of the President or a designated top White House official.
2. General Material: "General" material is that received from the public at large and other sources which, while important because it is addressed to the President, is not as important from the viewpoint of level of handling or subject matter as the "Executive" material. "General" includes all letters and documents which are not classified in the "Executive" category and, for example, may include routine communications from members of Congress, or memoranda exchanged among lower echelon officials.

Cross reference is not made between the "Executive" and "General" categories. A yellow folder label affixed to the left side of the folder designates the "Executive" material. A green folder label affixed to the right side of the folder designates the "General" material. The designation "Executive" or "General" also appears in the upper right hand corner of each case file.
