INTRODUCTION

by Dr. Richard M. Fried
University of Illinois at Chicago

The 1960 presidential campaign has always held a fascination for historians, political scientists, and devotés of American politics. There are many reasons for this. The campaign projected on the screen of national politics the alluring figure of John Fitzgerald Kennedy. For some years JFK has had his critics, as he did in his lifetime. Yet even after allowances are made for the rosy tint of the recollections of members of JFK's circle, there remains about the Kennedy years a Camelotian afterglow.

The campaign had importance well beyond the simple fact that it (narrowly) resulted in victory for Kennedy. The rhetoric of the campaign in great degree established the agenda of the decade of the 1960s. This is not to say that Kennedy or anyone else explicitly articulated what was to come—no more than Franklin D. Roosevelt spelled out the New Deal in 1932. But all the issues are there to be seen in the debate, the speech texts and drafts, the position papers, the marginalia accompanying them, and the hurried chits of phone conversations that were churned out in the course of the 1960 campaign.

Nineteen sixty marked the culmination of an extensive debate over national purpose. Kennedy was not alone in raising the question of the direction America must take. In varying degrees, all the Democratic presidential aspirants—Hubert H. Humphrey, Lyndon Baines Johnson, Stuart Symington, and (in both his “non-campaign” rhetoric in 1960 and earlier in his 1956 campaign) Adlai E. Stevenson—raised questions relating to the American agenda. So too did Richard M. Nixon, both in his dialogue with Kennedy and in the dialectic with Nelson Rockefeller, with whom Nixon agreed to the “Compact of Fifth Avenue” in order to head off a rival candidacy by the New York governor.

The defining of national purpose both informed and transcended simple partisan politics. Life magazine ran a series of articles that attempted to outline the nation's priorities. Eisenhower himself established a President's Commission on National Goals (administered by the American Assembly). The Republican party had its own Committee on Program and Policy, chaired by Charles Percy of Illinois. The Democratic Advisory Council, launched in the wake of the 1956 election, performed a similar function. The Rockefeller Brothers Fund launched a Special Studies Project in 1956 that resulted in a series of Rockefeller Panel reports. The preface to those reports articulates as well as any the heightened sense of urgent choice faced by the country as the 1960s dawned: “This project grew out of a belief that the United States, in the middle of the twentieth century, found itself in a critical situation requiring the urgent attention of thoughtful citizens.”¹

Virtually all this mounting of agendas implied a critical stance toward the Eisenhower years. Toward the end of the 1950s, there was a tendency in many quarters to dismiss Ike as a genial, grandfatherly, popular but bumbling, unassertive president of the “Whig” persuasion, who preferred to let issues fester or have others confront them, while he mouthed nondirectional pieties. In the then-current joke, the teller asked if one had heard about the Eisenhower doll—“you wind it up and it does nothing for eight years.” As recent “Eisenhower revisionist” scholarship has indicated, this is an unfair portrayal. There was more to the Eisenhower years than limping syntax, golf, and inaction, but however unfair, it was that perception of the Eisenhower era that informed much of the debate leading up to the 1960 election.

Pointing towards 1960, the Democrats made much of the purported inactivism of the Eisenhower years. They had much on which to build. The 1950s had been prosperous (and with minimal inflation), but annual economic growth had been modest; the spotty economy had bumped along into three recessions and had not erased numerous pockets of poverty (soon to be exposed in the writings of Michael Harrington and Dwight Macdonald). Nikita Khrushchev had bragged of the Communist system's greater vitality. "We will bury you" was the loose translation of one famous challenge. "Growthsmanship" became a major issue in the 1960 campaign and was linked by the Democrats to broader cold war questions.

Not just the quantity but the quality of development became an issue. Intellectuals had questioned the rampant consumerism of the Eisenhower years and the impoverishment of the public sector. It was automobile tailfins and hula hoops, while public transit and other facilities were neglected. The Democrats around Kennedy embraced these issues. The historian Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., who would play a prominent role in the Kennedy campaign and administration, distinguished between quantitative and "qualitative liberalism," and suggested that the latter's time had arrived. He expressed concern at the existence of "public poverty in the midst of private plenty" and feared that, without change, "a future Gibbon will regard the Eisenhower-Nixon era as the downward turning point when he comes to write about the Decline and Fall of the American Republic." Schlesinger also saw a need to regenerate idealism in American foreign policy. "In the age of Eisenhower, American idealism is the product of advertising men, not the by-product of national purpose."²

The campaign was about idealism, but also, in the view of many, about survival. In 1957, the Soviets launched Sputnik. They would continue to lead in the early phases of the space race. American efforts to score an extraterrestrial coup often blew up on the launching pad, prompting such caustic nicknames as "kerflopnik" or "kaputnik." The Democrats assailed the administration for its lagging efforts. One TV campaign spot picked up Kennedy's comment in Portland, Oregon: "The first vehicle in space was Sputnik, not Vanguard. The first country to place its national emblem on the moon was Russia, not America. The first passengers to return from a trip through space were named Strelka and Belka, not Rover and Fido."³

Thus, in accusing the Eisenhower administration of permitting the Soviets to outstrip us in rocketry, the Democrats charged that there existed a "missile gap." The issue was not JFK's alone. Senator Lyndon Baines Johnson's Preparedness subcommittee had examined this and other defense problems. Another candidate, Senator Stuart Symington, who had once been secretary of the air force, also made defense a point of major concentration. The Democratic Advisory Committee, established after the 1956 election to provide a (liberal) "issues" focus for the Democratic party, produced position papers critical of the Eisenhower defense policies. Kennedy participated in this general Democratic chorus about "gaps," and his campaign marked a culmination of that trend. Walt W. Rostow, another campaign adviser (and subsequently National Security Adviser) feared that "without the national security issue—the issue of survival—[the Democrats' other domestic issues] will be Hamlet without the Prince. . . ."⁴

Another key concern in the 1960 campaign was the civil rights issue. The six years prior to 1960 had witnessed such developments as the Brown decision; the Montgomery bus boycott and, in 1957, the garrisoning of Little Rock Central High School with federal troops; the Prayer Pilgrimage to Washington; and the first Civil Rights Act in over eighty years. In February 1960 the national sit-in movement was born in Greensboro, North Carolina, and soon spread to numerous other locales.

As a congressman and senator, Kennedy had never been identified with the cause of civil rights. His Pulitzer Prize-winning book, Profiles in Courage, accepted the orthodox pro-Southern view of Radical Reconstruction. He had drawn close to some Southern politicians in his quest for the nomination, and he had lined up with the South on two key votes on the 1957 Civil Rights Act (to send it to the Judiciary Committee and to provide for jury trials). Consequently his reputation needed bolstering among black voters. The Kennedy papers spell out his efforts to establish contact with the civil rights community; they show the work on his behalf by his supporters, and they testify to his gradual education in the civil rights issue.

During the campaign, Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., was briefly arrested during an Atlanta sit-in; he was later sentenced to four months at hard labor in connection with an earlier motor vehicle violation. JFK's phone call to Coretta Scott King, and Bobby Kennedy's to the judge who sentenced Reverend King, had a dramatic effect in the black community. Kennedy succeeded in regaining many of the votes that had drifted into the Republican column during the Eisenhower years. At the same time, he managed to retain something of a reputation for moderation among many white Southerners.⁵

In 1960 the issue that appeared to be the most intractable was, of course, Kennedy's Catholicism. This microfilm collection is particularly strong in this area. James Wine was hired from the staff of the National Council of Churches to handle the Catholic issue under the rubric of "Community Relations." His office answered up to a thousand letters a week on the Catholic issue. The Wine File (portions of which are included in this collection) is thus a trove of valuable sources on the religious question. These vary from scurrilous and far-out tracts (about the phony Knights of Columbus Oath, goings-on in convents and so forth), to invocations of the Inquisition, to reasoned concern about the Church and such issues as birth control and aid to education. One writer asked JFK if he would "confess state secrets to a priest? (Russia could have trained a priest.)"⁶

Kennedy comported himself well in his formal responses to questions about his Catholicism. His performance before the Houston Ministerial Association in September was acclaimed as a masterpiece. House Speaker Sam Rayburn declared that "he ate 'em blood raw." But the Wine Files indicate that Kennedy had not convinced everyone. Indeed, his reasonableness on issues of church and state angered some Catholics. One co-religionist wrote that JFK's statement that no religious tenet could supersede his oath of office "seems to be the product of a mind with only a surface value or knowledge of the Catholic religion." (Jacqueline Kennedy had once termed it "unfair for Jack to be opposed because he is a Catholic. After all, he's such a poor Catholic.")⁷

There was, of course, another side of the issue. The Republicans had made inroads on the Catholic vote, especially among ethnic groups linked to "Captive Nations" under Communist rule. One attraction of Kennedy's candidacy was his purported ability to recapture these Catholic votes. There is a copy of the much-noted unsigned memorandum, "The Catholic Vote in 1952 and 1956," which argued that the Democratic party could ill afford to ignore the Catholic vote. It was written by Theodore B. Sorensen but then attributed to John Bailey of Connecticut to deflect the inevitable critics, who assailed it as a form of blackmail. Kennedy's campaign staff, conversant with the historical literature, was aware both that Catholicism in itself had not accounted for Al Smith's defeat in the 1928 election and that, because the country had changed and Kennedy was not Smith, the issue would not be as potent in 1960 as thirty-two years before.⁸

Through these documents the Kennedy campaign is accessible as perhaps no other presidential effort in our history. One can plot the campaign's progress geographically and politically. The speeches show where the candidate went and what he said. The plethora of public opinion polls offers a comprehensive sense of the impact of the campaign, as well as of the social and political context in which it took place. It is unlikely that a more complete record of the public pulse in an election year is to be found. At the same time, the Kennedy papers afford us an intimate look at the inside of the campaign. The numerous position papers and briefing papers show us the Kennedy campaigners' perspectives on the live questions of the day and demonstrate how these meshed into a unified campaign theme. They reveal the staff's reaction to (and anticipation of) thrust and counterthrust during the pre-convention competition and during the fall campaign.

Thus, the speeches. Going back to 1953, these chronicle Kennedy's evolution as a national figure. They range from a talk on federal flood insurance to JFK's much-heralded address on the Algerian crisis; from Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners to a speech honoring the Hungarian freedom fighters; from remarks up and down the valleys of West Virginia to the July 15, 1960, speech accepting the presidential nomination, which implanted "the New Frontier" in the national lexicon. Cumulatively as well as individually, the speeches express the sense of crisis, of critical choice, that JFK tried to instill in his campaign. Five times in the campaign Kennedy referred to the Spartans' self-sacrifice at Thermopylae. The theme of sacrifice is central to the 1960 campaign (though, in one notable campaign memo, JFK was warned to avoid this theme in Kentucky, which already, according to the writer, lived close to the bone).

The polls are another rich source. Kennedy's chief pollster was Lou Harris. There is probably no richer lode for a national campaign. The polls permit at least a rough measurement of the extent to which Democratic rhetoric filtered down to the people. The evidence is mixed. Poll after poll turns up impressive numbers of people responding to traditional issues—the cost of living, farm prices, and so on. The need to "rebuild U.S. prestige" makes frequent appearances, too. What is interesting is the number of times the whole cluster of foreign policy issues cut in Nixon's, not Kennedy's, favor. Nonetheless, Lou Harris, caught up in the campaign's spirit, recommended hitting the standard "we can do better" thesis in such states. It is possible that the "New Frontier" theme was a preoccupation largely of the political elites whose rhetoric it colored.

The polls thus permit a judgment as to how much of the Kennedy aura that we associate with the 1960 campaign was present at the time and how much has been retroactively imposed upon it by the sense of loss that followed JFK's assassination. In a sense the 1960 campaign was a conventional one. As post-election vote analyses have shown, it is best understood as a "maintaining" election in the New Deal tradition. Still, the polls do indicate how attractive Kennedy's personality proved to be. Several times Harris compared Kennedy to FDR. Some polls emphasized the public perception that JFK "cares" or that there was "an aura of activity" and a sense of "excitement and verve" around him. The term "image" is used frankly (and a little self-consciously) throughout the summaries of campaign polls. And yet, the polls are also full of data pointing to voters' concern with more conventional issues like farm prices, taxes, and the cost of living.⁹

These microfilmed campaign files permit examination of the shaping of the major issues of 1960. But they also permit us to tease out less overt but still significant developments. For example, one leitmotif that can be traced through the panorama of the campaign was the shopping center. That especially American construct was the location for several Kennedy speeches; its appearance on his itineraries illustrates a major facet of social history. More than that, it became a symbolic issue—a minor but revealing one. It represented, of course, the apotheosis of consumerism that colored the fifties and, said Democrats in their “qualitative” mode, it exemplified the inadequacy of the Republican vision of the good society. The “Nixonpedia,” the Democrats’ collation of almost everything the Vice-President had said on virtually every issue, even picked up this theme. Nixon was quoted as saying, “If you think the United States has stood still, who built the largest shopping center in the world?” An appended comment noted that “the Russians have built the largest dams, the largest missile, the largest satellite, have the largest army—and these things are much more important for our future than shopping centers.”¹⁰

Yet we can also find illustrations of the fact that the Kennedy campaign did not always march to the clarion call of “national purpose.” One polling expert, balking at a principal campaign motif, offered the cautioning advice that “the ‘sacrifice’ theme could really lay an egg. . . .” Sometimes the campaign stressed JFK’s war with Teamsters’ leader Jimmy Hoffa. Then, too, the briefing papers for Kennedy’s swing through southern Illinois include the terse instruction to stress the theme of “Strong America to Defeat Godless Communism.”¹¹

The campaign records illustrate an unusual amount of lofty rhetoric about grand themes. Kennedy was certainly not the first candidate to have a “braintrust,” but his may have been the most elaborate. Beginning with a Harvard-MIT nucleus (with help from Amherst and Williams), it encompassed other universities in state campaigns. These papers are full of materials attesting to Kennedy’s efforts to woo the intellectuals. A key juncture in Kennedy’s quest of the nomination and a death knell for the draft-Stevenson effort may have been his capture of the support of many of the country’s noted intellectuals. Certainly that conquest was an important event in its own right.

The John F. Kennedy papers are not the only ones that afford glimpses into the 1960 campaign. At the Kennedy Library itself, one should also look at the papers of Robert F. Kennedy and Ted Sorensen, two key architects of the campaign. Several other collections also contain important materials on the election. Then there are the papers of all the other candidates as well. However, John F. Kennedy’s papers do have much to offer. They are a vast storehouse of information about movers and shakers at national headquarters and about the high ideals that pervaded the rhetoric of the campaign. They also contain data about the concerns of the people at the opposite end of the line—the voters—and the degree to which the “New Frontier” themes percolated down to the grassroots. They thus offer a blend of the sacred and the profane, in short a panorama of American politics in the critical year of 1960.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

Part II of The John F. Kennedy 1960 Campaign is drawn from two major groupings of records within the Pre-Presidential Papers located at the John F. Kennedy Library. The first major grouping of records constitutes the Senate Files. From the Senate Files, University Publications of America (UPA) has included in this micropublication the Speech Files, 1953-1960, and the Algeria Speech Files, 1957.

The Speech Files, 1953-1960 (Boxes 893-914, Reels 1-10) contain the complete transcripts of speeches delivered by John F. Kennedy from 1953 to 1960, arranged chronologically. In addition to the actual transcripts, these files contain drafts of speeches with Kennedy's and Theodore Sorensen's comments and corrections, typescripts, reading copies, and press releases for speech appearances. These speech files chronicle Kennedy's evolution as a national figure and a presidential candidate. Speeches in these files range from Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners to a talk on federal flood insurance to a speech honoring Hungarian freedom fighters. UPA has published the Speech Files, 1953-1960, in their entirety. Only duplicate copies of speeches and correspondence have been deleted.

The Algeria Speech Files, 1957 (Box 919, Reel 12) contain a reprint of the controversial speech by Kennedy on the French handling of the civil war in Algeria. This speech provided Kennedy with one of his first major foreign policy stands. These files also contain correspondence from the Democratic National Committee, background materials from Theodore Sorensen and Norman Thomas, and a large amount of public opinion mail. They are published in their entirety, except for duplicates and the public opinion mail.

The second major grouping of records is the 1960 Campaign Files. From the Speeches, Statements, and Sections Files, 1958-1960, UPA has included the Speech Files, 1958-1960, and the Kennedy Press Conferences, 1960, each filmed in its entirety except for duplicate material. In addition, UPA has filmed the complete Kennedy-Nixon debate materials from the Press Secretary's Subject Files of the 1960 Campaign Files.

The Speech Files, 1958-1960 (Boxes 1028-1032, Reels 10-12) include campaign speeches, statements, and excerpts that, at the Kennedy Library, are arranged both chronologically and by subject. UPA has chosen to present the subjective files in this micropublication, listed as the Subjective Speech Files in the Table of Contents and the Reel Index. Major subjects on which Kennedy spoke include agriculture, civil rights, crime, defense, the Democratic Party, education, foreign affairs, immigration, labor, natural resources, the presidency, social security and depressed areas, and urban problems.

The Kennedy Press Conferences, 1960 (Boxes 1025-1027, Reel 12) are arranged chronologically, and cover January through October of 1960. Included are transcripts of the press conferences, as well as supporting correspondence. Kennedy spoke on a variety of subjects at each press conference, so the researcher will find a wide range of material within each file.

The Kennedy-Nixon debates (Boxes 1051-1052, Reel 12) are arranged alphabetically by subject, and include the transcripts of the debates, internal communications, and correspondence dealing with the debates between Kennedy and his staff as well as his staff and the television networks.

REEL INDEX

The frame number on the left side of a page identifies where a specific file begins. When pertinent, the index denotes the major substantive issues under the category of Major Subjects. Individuals who contributed significant correspondence, wrote particularly insightful material, or gave speeches are denoted under the category of Principal Correspondents or Principal Speakers. References to Senator Kennedy are to John F. Kennedy. More than one major topic in a speech is indicated in the quoted title by the use of a semicolon following the first (and subsequent) main topic(s). When possible, the town and state where the speaking occurred, as well as the date, are indicated.

As the Subjective Speech Files are all remarks of Senator Kennedy, his authorship is not indicated.
