NEW DEAL ECONOMIC POLICY IN PERSPECTIVE

Introduction to UPA Index and Microfiche Collection

INTRODUCTION

The world confronted a grave peacetime crisis on March 4, 1933, the day Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated as president of the United States. Nothing less than the future of liberal capitalism was at stake. Emerging from the fourth winter of the Great Depression, millions of Americans, one quarter of the work force, were unemployed with little hope of a change in their fortunes. The engines of capitalism, its banks, closed by the thousands across the country, some temporarily, many permanently. Moreover, it was a worldwide crisis—although in no country was the depression as severe as in the U.S. because no country enjoyed such extensive capitalist development as the U.S. At stake was not merely a recovery of prosperity but the future of democracy itself. In Europe fascism was entrenched in Italy; Germany had just opted for the Nazi dictatorship; and Russia had long since been captured by a Communist dictatorship. The rest of democratic Europe watched these experiments in totalitarianism for indications that they could generate economic growth, security and stability, albeit at the price of liberty. At the same time, European attentions focused upon the U.S. for signs of how its liberal capitalism would fare.

The U.S. response to the depression was exceptionally voluntaristic. The Hoover administration maintained that relief of the unemployed was the responsibility of private agencies and state and local governments. President Hoover counted upon the depression of the 1930's repeating the brevity of the 1920-1921 depression. He resisted proposals for escalated federal public works spending, arguing that such panicky measures would exacerbate cycle behavior from deflation to inflation. But Hoover compromised on control of fiscal policy with Congress; some works spending was initiated and taxes were increased in an abortive effort to make up the federal deficit. Also, he conceded to bankers assistance from the federal treasury in the form of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC), a credit relief agency capitalized initially at a half billion dollars and modeled after the War Finance Corporation of 1918-1929. It was intended to engender public confidence in the absence of private credit pools. Many critics and supporters of the RFC recognized in it the beginnings of state capitalism that drew upon public financial experiments during the Great War of 1917-1918. But Hoover strenuously opposed additional federal programs. RFC administration over the winter of 1932-1933 was timid with the consequence that several state governors had to contain bank closings by declaring "bank holidays" to prevent depositors from withdrawing funds. As the country awaited new leadership to conclude the interregnum between the Hoover and Roosevelt presidencies, it pondered the meaning of Franklin D. Roosevelt's promise in his acceptance speech at the Democratic convention to give it a "New Deal." It soon became evident that a consensus among policymakers had emerged for capitalist planning that drew upon the regulatory experiences of the progressive era and the emergency measures of World War I.

Banking

The New Deal initially attacked the depression on several fronts: banking, agriculture, industry, public works, work relief, and regional development. Its policies were not consistent: Along with economic expansion, it paradoxically practiced governmental economy. But its first task was to save liberal capitalism; Roosevelt had to save the banks. To resolve the banking crisis Roosevelt first declared a national bank holiday under powers Congress conferred upon the president in the Trading-with-the-Enemy Act of 1917. During the brief hiatus policymakers agreed upon a strategy that closed many banks not worth saving and reinforced stronger banks with RFC loans. But loans only increased bank obligations and postponed complete recovery. Congress in the hastily devised Banking Act of 1933 (B-333-H10) conferred additional powers and funds upon the RFC and it now offered bankers a "Partnership" with government by purchasing a bank's preferred stock. That gave the banks new capital resources in exchange for tighter federal supervision. Because many bankers opposed any apparent federal intrusion into their management, RFC Chairman Jesse Jones, a Houston banker, secured congressional creation of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) and coupled it with bank sale of preferred stock (B-361-H1). Roosevelt had resisted suggestions for deposit "guarantees," maintaining that without proper regulation bankers would take unnecessary investment risks or engage in corrupt practices for which the federal government would be responsible. Yet he accepted Congress's linkage of FDIC with regulation and it became one of the New Deal's distinct successes. However, along with most American bankers, Roosevelt demanded the separation of commercial and investment banking, while resisting bank consolidations that also permitted branch banking. These requirements automatically limited the size and strength of American banks.

Agriculture

Roosevelt's decision to confront next the depression in agriculture stemmed from the fact that nearly half of all Americans depended upon farm prosperity and that a rural crisis had persisted in varying degrees since 1920. Most policy-makers favored a strategy using farmer cooperatives—cartel-like organizations exempt from prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Law. In particular, a handful of agricultural economists promoted a “domestic allotment” scheme that would have the cooperatives create national commodity organizations to restrain production for the purpose of reducing supplies and increasing prices. The New Deal's Agricultural Adjustment Administration (AAA) bought the scarcity scheme. Initially it sought to slash farm output through emergency measures such as the slaughter of pigs before they reached market size, trampling cotton before it could be picked, or dumping milk. At a time filled with deprivation, the wanton destruction of necessities horrified people. But AAA policy emphasized democratic decision-making to limit output so that commodity prices rose in a controlled manner. It established target prices based upon prices during the last prosperous pre-war period, 1909–1914. However, achieving total producer cooperation is always difficult and AAA devised an incentive in the form of benefit payments to farmers who cooperated with government-prescribed quotas (A-362-S2). At the same time it pegged benefit payments at high percentages of the target prices in order to give farmers some income until commodity prices could rise to the full target levels.

To pay for the benefit payments AAA instituted a processing tax to be paid by the food processor when it purchased the commodity. This created undesirable food price hikes as the processors and the stores passed the tax along to the consumer in the form of higher retail prices. Inflated prices limited sales and curtailed economic recovery by increasing urban living costs in order to enhance rural incomes. AAA policy also had other undesirable social side effects. It gave benefit payments only to landowners and left to their discretion the matter of sharing the money with tenants and sharecroppers. Many landowners used the payments either to buy labor-saving machinery or to let the land lie fallow. Tenant farmers and sharecroppers found themselves expendable. The policy especially affected the south and its huge rural black population. It is estimated that about 350,000 poor whites and blacks migrated to the cities during the 1930's as a result of AAA policies. In the late New Deal, Congress created the Farm Security Administration to deal with the problem of unemployable farm workers in distress. Moreover, in the Butler case of 1936 the Supreme Court ruled that the processing tax was unconstitutional (A-362-H2), compelling the AAA to be supported directly by the Treasury. Nevertheless, AAA was a revolution in American agriculture and became the basis for agricultural policy for decades to come. Commodity prices through the 1930's rose and the government remained a principal organizer and supervisor of the farmer's cartel.

Other New Deal strategies also benefited farmers. Many farmers had contracted enormous debts during the war years when the government had subsidized increased production—thereby indirectly encouraging farmers to buy more tillable land and/or invest in machinery. Those debts persisted through the 1920's. Fearing that AAA benefit payments merely transferred money to farm creditors without improving rural living standards, the RFC devised the Commodity Credit Corporation (CCC). By using their crops as collateral, CCC enabled farmers to rid themselves of debts completely through low-interest credit. Although AAA policies were more dramatic, farmers believed that CCC went further toward restoring farm prosperity by ridding them of a great burden.

National Industrial Recovery Act

Early in the New Deal some congressmen, led by Senator Hugo Black of Alabama, proposed legislation mandating the reduction of hours worked in interstate trade to no more than thirty per week (I-351-S1). Economists and the administration deemed this effort to spread work among more workers as inefficient in restoring prosperity. Nevertheless, it compelled policymakers to offer alternative proposals for planning the industrial marketplace. The result was an omnibus bill that promised something for everybody: the National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA) (I-332-S1). It had two distinct parts; the first created a National Recovery Administration (NRA), and the second called for a Public Works Administration (PWA).

The NRA was given blanket powers to concoct a strategy for increasing industrial prices. Modeled on 1918's War Industries Board (WIB), which had successfully boosted wartime production while restraining prices, NRA's commission called for restraining production and lifting incomes via a floor under prices. Of course, the strategy mirrored that of the AAA—cartel-like organization commodity by commodity. Since rising prices threatened the working poor, NIRA's Section 7(a) promised collective bargaining for unions, thereby touching off a unionization movement among workers in manufacturing. When that only encouraged the growth of company unions, Congress passed the National Labor Relations Act (the Wagner Act) of 1935, creating a National Labor Relations Board that would hold democratic elections to determine one bargaining agent for all workers in a plant (E-371-S2).

The head of the NRA was General Hugh Johnson, once the Army's representative on the WIB and a crony of WIB chairman Bernard Baruch. (The first head of the AAA was George Peek, a farm machinery manufacturer, a former member of the WIB, a crony of WIB chairman Bernard Baruch, and a former business partner with Hugh Johnson.) Johnson believed the only way the NRA could accomplish its difficult assignment was with public works incentives for industrial cooperation. Wartime manipulated production and prices had convinced Johnson that markets were too competitive for effective cooperation unless the government wielded inviting lures for industry such as war contracts. In peacetime, only public works contracts for jobs and materials could extort cooperation from producers.

The PWA called for in the second part of NIRA was funded with $3.3 billion. However, to Johnson's consternation Roosevelt gave the leadership of PWA to Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes. Ickes was a good government reformer who recalled how democratic politicians spent wildly with enormous waste on graft. Determined to avoid such things, Ickes moved cautiously. Recovery would not be aided by accelerated public works spending.

Remarkably, the NRA had a successful run of two years. It held hearings in thousands of industries and established production codes or standards and fixed “fair” minimum prices. Of course, certain industries such as coal mining were difficult to organize because of their thousands of enormously competitive units; other industries such as steel had fewer competitors and cooperated more readily. NRA administrators tackled the most competitive industries first and once they won the struggle for acceptable codes to govern them, the least competitive industries quickly fell into place. That took care of production, but a business revival depended upon rising consumer demand. Here is where Johnson applied his experience in war. NRA adopted a logo, a blue eagle with a gear in one claw and lightning bolts symbolizing action in the other, with a motto, "We Do Our Part." The patriotic consumer would patronize only stores that displayed the blue eagle on their windows and buy only products whose labels showed the blue eagle. Thus, the blue eagle compelled industrial cooperation. To achieve consumer cooperation, the NRA held parades in major cities and exhorted consumers to "Buy Now." The inevitable answer to that, however, was "with what?"

By the spring of 1935 economic indices indicated the economy was recovering, although nobody could be certain it was due to NRA. Many businessmen liked NRA, both because they attributed the upturn to industrial cooperation and because they were weary of "ruinous" or "destructive" competition. Even so, other businessmen complained of government regimentation and NRA's inability to prevent price "chiseling." Controversy over NRA climaxed in early 1935 when the United States Supreme Court ruled in the Schechter "sick children" case that NRA could not regulate a Brooklyn butcher who did business only within the state of New York (I-352-S1). Its inability to regulate intrastate businesses collapsed NRA, although Roosevelt denounced this return to a "horse-and-buggy" economy and remained enamored of price stabilizing schemes.

Unemployment relief

For relief of the unemployed the New Deal always preferred work relief to the "dole." At the outset it established the Federal Emergency Relief Administration (FERA). Working with state agencies that administered federal grants, FERA initially put $500 million into the hands of workers who performed small works projects. But with the onset of the fifth winter of the depression (1933-1934) it became evident this was far from enough. An additional appropriation put four million more workers in temporary jobs for the Civil Works Administration (CWA), which survived only until the spring of 1934. FERA lasted three years and spent $1.5 billion on work relief, only 29 percent of which was contributed by state or local governments. Another agency begun in 1933, the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) (E-332-H2), targeted unemployed young men and veterans for conservation work in forests or building roads, bridges and telephone lines. In 1935 Congress and the administration instituted the Works Progress Administration (WPA). Most of its projects were initiated by local agencies in partnership with the WPA. The nature of WPA's work projects made its anagram fabled in American depression lore; WPA was noted for arts projects which supported local efforts to employ talented people in work especially suited to their talents. Writers wrote state guides, musicians formed local orchestras, actors performed in local productions of Shakespeare and New York productions of T.S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral, and artists painted murals on post office walls. WPA's National Youth Administration (NYA) organized unemployed youths for useful social tasks. Also, the Resettlement Administration (RA) built model communities for the unemployed and their families, most of which failed for lack of sustaining industry. Annual New Deal expenditures for relief between early 1932 and late 1940 totaled $2.6 billion. Such monies, by increasing personal consumption, lessened distress and contributed to economic growth. In fact, some economists and historians argue that relief actually made a more significant contribution to economic recovery than the recovery agencies—NRA, PWA, and AAA.

Fiscal policy

On the other hand, New Deal fiscal policy may have hindered recovery. It lacked any strategy or theme. In 1932 the Hoover administration attempted to institute a national sales tax, but the Congress defeated that effort at regressive taxation and increased the income tax's progressivity. Either way, taxation had to have a negative effect on recovery. Few politicians or economists then believed in deficit financing. The principal fiscal goal was to balance the federal government's budget or at least come as close to it as lower revenues permitted. Contrary to political mythology concerning the New Deal's commitment to spending, Roosevelt was dedicated to a balanced budget. While revenues hit a meager $1.9 billion in 1932 and then began a steady climb to $5.6 billion in 1938, federal spending rose from $3.6 billion in 1931 to $8.4 billion in 1936, creating a 1936 deficit of $4.4 billion—whereupon Roosevelt ruthlessly reduced expenditures to $7.7 billion in 1937 and $6.8 billion in 1938, resulting in a deficit of $1.2 billion. "Sin" taxes on tobacco and liquor hit the poor rather hard; beginning in 1935 Roosevelt endeavored to "soak-the-rich" with higher income taxes, but the campaign frightened wealthy people more than it taxed them. The so-called "Wealth Tax Act" of 1935 (B-353-H6) had less progressivity than either the Revenue Act of 1932 or of 1936. However, the latter included a tax on corporation profits not distributed to shareholders or reinvested in the company. Perhaps nothing else terrorized corporations as much as the undistributed profits tax. In 1938 a resurgent conservative coalition of southern Democrats and Republicans in Congress wrote it out of the federal budget. In the winter of 1936 the president finally surrendered his goal of a balanced budget with progressive taxes and instituted planned deficit spending for recovery and relief. As a result, whereas taxes had paid for 82.4 percent of federal expenditures in fiscal 1938, taxes paid for only 56.8 percent of the following budget.

The fiscal policies of the states also had an impact on economic recovery. The Hoover administration had mandated regressive state sales taxes for states seeking to qualify for federal relief programs under the Emergency Relief and Construction Act of 1932. Even without that incentive, most states found it politically easier to enact sales taxes to meet their own deficits. Of course, all taxes further reduced consumption. An example of this was the Social Security tax enacted in 1935 (B-354-S1) without any corresponding benefits being paid before 1942. At a time when recovery appeared to have returned, the Social Security tax was effectively regressive and deflationary because of the equality of its burden and its intent to store the collections in a trust fund. Employers passed the cost of their contributions along to consumers, further reducing consumption. The AAA and NRA indirectly taxed consumers by favoring producers with higher prices, adding to the overall deflationary impact upon the economy.

Wall Street

Businessmen frequently accused the New Deal of hindering recovery—especially in its regulation of the New York Stock Exchange. In truth, however, many Wall Street investors conceded that reforms were overdue. Ordinary investors did not enjoy the advantages of insiders and frequently were given deliberately misleading information or suffered when insiders manipulated prices. Public outrage against Wall Street had been growing since 1929. In 1932 a book, The Modern Corporation and Private Property by Adolf A. Berle and Gardiner C. Means, created a sensation by arguing that a majority of the wealth of the United States was controlled by only 200 corporations and that the control of those corporations had been usurped from their shareholders by their managers. The issue involved the restoration of democracy in securities markets. Congress took the first step in 1933 with the passage of the Truth-in-Securities Act, which required more candor in marketing stocks. But the next year New Dealers concluded the Act could not be enforced unless Congress created an administrative tribunal. This led to creation of the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) in 1934. A year later Congress addressed a special corporation problem—the disappearance of most electric utilities into a half dozen holding companies controlled by paper agreements written in New York. The Wheeler-Rayburn Public Utilities Act of 1935 (B-351-51) attacked this concentration of wealth by sentencing the holding companies to death by 1940, commissioning the SEC to oversee their transmutation from giants impervious to any geographical contiguity into regional or local companies responsive to customer needs.

The Tennessee Valley Authority

The New Deal's war against Wall Street and the utilities was facilitated by a 1930's movement for public power. Spearheading the movement was the president of the United States. Roosevelt did not want government ownership of the transmission and distribution of electric systems so much as he believed that in certain instances the fairness of electricity's price to the consumer required government's ownership of the generating plant. If utilities lacked public power competition, then they would charge whatever the traffic would bear. In many undeveloped areas of the South and the West, economic growth depended upon cheap power. Many municipalities across the country owned their own power facilities, the most noteworthy being Los Angeles and Seattle. Although coal furnished power in many areas, power furnished by hydroelectricity was the cheapest energy source. The issue came to a head when Roosevelt decided to make the World War hydroelectric project on the Tennessee River at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, the cornerstone of the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) (A-322-H2).

The Authority was a planning project that not only sold electricity to local public and private power facilities, but also engaged in flood control, soil conservation and extensive social planning for the entire Tennessee Valley. As such it serviced portions of Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Kentucky. Unable to compete, private utilities sold out to TVA when it set rates below theirs. At the same time, TVA obliged other neighboring utilities to reduce their rates. The rural South benefitted enormously from the TVA. From the example of TVA Congress created the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) in 1936 (A-363-H5). Ninety per cent of all American farmers lacked electricity and a large number of those with electricity lived in California. The New Deal modernized farms when REA gave low-cost loans to non-profit, rural cooperatives that built and democratically operated distribution systems.

TVA dams enormously expanded energy production which would be surplus unless consumption expanded to absorb it. TVA created the Electric Home and Farm Authority (EHFA) in order to make it affordable for consumers to wire houses and barns, and to buy appliances such as refrigerators, stoves, radios and plumbing systems that could make their homes, farms and lives more comfortable. As a credit agency, in 1935 EHFA passed from TVA to the control of the RFC, which made it national in scope. EHFA, TVA, and REA were New Deal policy contradictions because they worked to restore prosperity through economic growth instead of the economy of scarcity inherent in AAA, NRA and the "fair trade" Robinson-Patman and Miller-Tydings Acts. The New Deal enormously expanded the energy output of the country not only by creating TVA, but by building the Bonneville Power Authority (BPA) and the Grand Coulee Dam on the Columbia River in Washington State and the Lower Colorado River project in Texas. This had the unintended benefit of building an energy infrastructure to support the mobilization for war in the 1940's.

The New Deal Legacy

The New Deal did not bring recovery. But New Deal economic recovery planning unintentionally prepared the nation for World War II's mobilization. In 1938 the New Deal embarked upon the economics of growth that would have eventually brought recovery without the rampant inflation that accompanied war. Additionally, the most important legacy of New Deal economic policies was their emphasis upon democratic participation and democratic institutions. At a time when much of the world had scrapped democratic political and economic institutions, the New Deal insisted they could be made to work in behalf of masses of people—that they could bring growth, security and stability without the loss of participation and individual liberty. In 1940, when most of continental Europe was under the hegemony of one kind of totalitarian dictatorship or another, the United States maintained its faith in a liberal system of economics. A half century later that faith would finally prevail throughout all of Europe.

NEW DEAL ECONOMIC POLICIES

FDR and the Congress, 1933 to 1938

USER GUIDE

New Deal Economic Policies microfiche collection contains primary research materials on the Roosevelt Administration and Congress from the Agricultural Emergency Act of 1933 to the last act of the New Deal, the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. The collection includes basic documents on all major New Deal economic legislation and most important subsequent revisions.

The collection of approximately 400 microfiche includes 308 carefully selected congressional committee reports, documents, prints, hearings, and presidential messages to Congress published during the 73rd to 75th Congresses.

Criteria for selection include:

- Senate or House committee conference or other reports containing a definitive or final text of the legislation and some analysis of expected effects of the legislation; Senate and House reports or documents on the same legislation were not both selected unless each contained significant analysis or content not included in the other.
- Congressional hearings containing testimony by Roosevelt Administration officials or important advisors, and investigative hearings related to economic policy.
- Committee prints containing final texts of legislation, significant hearings extracts, or special studies or analyses, such as those by the Bureau of Labor Statistics or Brookings Institution.
- Texts of Supreme Court decisions ruling on the validity of major New Deal legislation, such as the constitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act (A-362-H2), the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act (I-362-S1), or the Live Poultry Industry Code (I-352-S1).

To provide background and some historical context, the collection also includes the text of the Revenue Act of 1932 (B-322-H1), a seven-part 1931 congressional report on the operation of the national and federal reserve banking systems (B311-S1 to S7), and five reports on the investigation of the concentration of economic power by the Temporary National Economic Committee in 1939 and 1940 (I-381-S3, I-392-S1, I-404-S1 to I-404-S3).

HOW TO USE THE REFERENCE BIBLIOGRAPHY AND INDEXES

The instructions below describe the document accession numbering system used for the collection, and review the organization, information elements, and suggested uses of the Reference Bibliography, Index by Subjects and Names, Index by Titles, Index by Bill Numbers, and Index by Document and Report Numbers.

Accession Numbers

Each Congressional committee report, document, print, or hearing in the collection is identified by a single alphanumeric accession number for reference purposes in the Bibliography and Index sections. This accession number is identical to the publication's microfiche accession number in the companion microfiche collection, and indicates its subject category, the year it was published, and whether it is a hearing, document, report, or print of the House or Senate, as follows:

Subject category

- A — Agriculture
- B — Banking and Finance
- E — Employment and Social Welfare
- I — Industrial Recovery
- T — Interstate Commerce and Foreign Trade
- U — Presidential State of the Union Messages

Year of publication

31 through 40 (1931 through 1940)

Type of publication

- 1 — Hearing
- 2 — Document
- 3 — Report
- 4 — Committee Print

Publication source

- H — House
- S — Senate
- J — Joint

Thus, the accession number B-373-H1 indicates the general subject of the publication is Banking (B); it was published in 1937 (37); it is a report (3); and it is the first 1937 House report on banking in the collection (H1).

REFERENCE BIBLIOGRAPHY

Publications in the collection are grouped by general subject category in both the printed Reference Bibliography and the accompanying microfiche collection, as an aid to researchers interested in a particular aspect of economic policy. While each category includes most of the publications in the collection on the subject indicated, some publications in other categories may also relate to the subject. To find all publications on a given subject, users should refer to the detailed Index by Subjects and Names.

Information provided for each publication in the Reference Bibliography includes the UPA accession number assigned to the publication, complete bibliographic data, and a list of descriptors assigned to the publication by UPA editors. Hearings include the names, affiliations, and page range locations for each witness appearing at the hearing. Some hearings also include a brief description of the purpose and focus of the hearing, if this is not indicated by the document title.

Bibliographic Data

Bibliographic data for each publication includes the title and the following information:

Date

The date of publication, or, for hearings, the date(s) the hearings were held.

Congress session and year

The number and session of the Congress, and the year of the session; for example, 75/1/37 indicates the 75th Congress, first session, which met in 1937.

Collation

The collation for documents and reports refers to the total number of pages occupied on the microfiche by the publication. Collation for hearings and prints provides exact volume pagination.

Superintendent of Documents number

Wherever possible, the Superintendent of Documents classification number has been given for published hearings and committee prints.

Congressional committee

The Congressional committee or subcommittee issuing the hearing or other document.

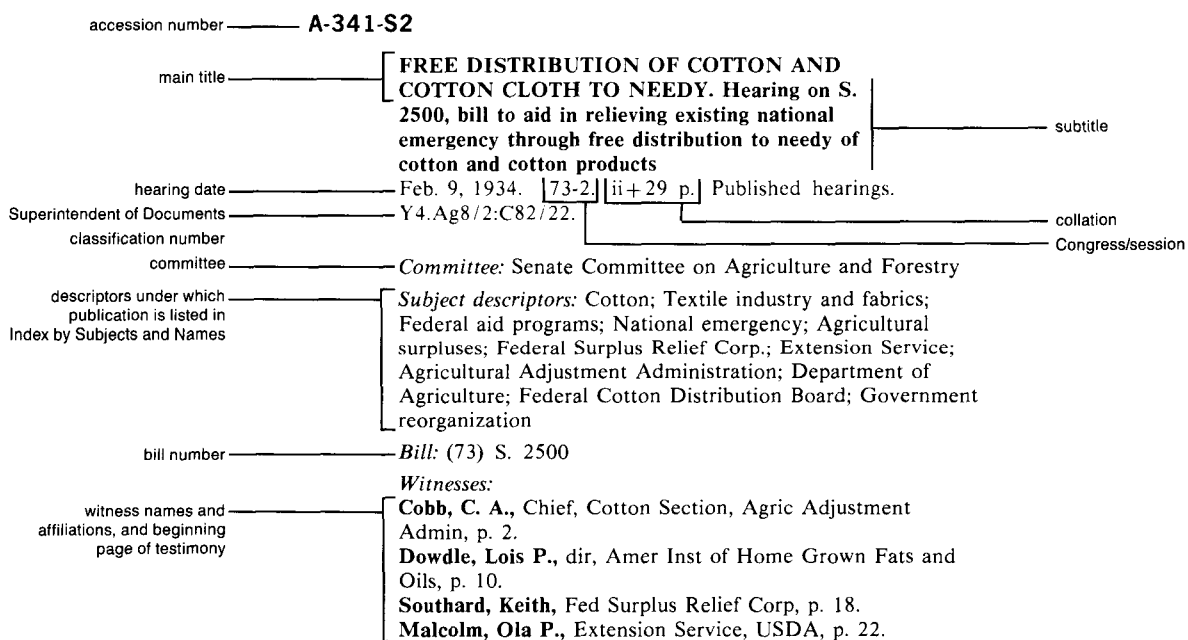

Bill numbers

The numbers of House or Senate bills referred to in the hearing or other publications.

Descriptors

Subject descriptors, or index terms, assigned to the publication by UPA editors are grouped in a paragraph following the bibliographic information and indicate the nature and scope of the publication. These are the descriptors under which the publication has been listed in the Index by Subjects and Names, along with all other publications to which the same term has been assigned.

INDEX BY SUBJECTS AND NAMES

The Index by Subject and Names provides access by the principal subject or subjects of the publication and by the names and affiliations of witnesses if the publication is a committee hearing, or by the names of the author or authors if the publication is a special study or report. The names of organizations or government bodies, and of individuals if they are the subject of the publication, are also indexed.

Entries in this index consist of the following elements:

- subject or name term;
- characterization of the content of the publication;
- Congress, session, and session year of the publication;
- accession number assigned to each indexed publication, which indicates the subject category, year, and type of publication and also identifies the publication in the Reference Bibliography and other indexes, and in the microfiche collection.
- cross-references (see and see also).

Subject terms

Publications are indexed to the most specific applicable subject terms that represent the primary focus of the publication, and usually not also to broader or narrower terms that do not reflect the subject as well. Most publications are indexed to five or more subject terms.

See also terms direct the user to narrower, related terms, and See references direct the user from terminology not used in the UPA controlled vocabulary thesaurus to specific subject terms used in the Index by Subjects and Names.

Characterization of publication content

The brief content description or characterization of each publication listed under a subject term in the index begins with an initial word (or keyword) that relates to the subject matter of the publication and to that particular subject term. To the extent possible, the same keyword is used for documents of similar content so they will group alphabetically under each subject term. Users should, however, scan all content descriptions under a subject term to be certain they have identified all publications of interest for a particular search.

Alphabetization and sorting of references

Index terms and content characterizations are alphabetized on a word-by-word and letter-by-letter basis.
