GENERAL INTRODUCTION

Once the bulk of the papers and tapes from the five-and-one-half years Richard Milhous Nixon served in the White House are released, his presidency will become the best documented in United States history. Because of Nixon's unprecedented forced resignation from office in 1974, little about his truncated administration appears normal in retrospect, including the complicated problems surrounding his presidential papers. The sheer magnitude of the collection overwhelms scholars and nonspecialists alike. There are, for example, forty million pages of documents in the White House Central Files and 4,000 hours of recorded conversations. At the end of 1987, only three million documents and 12½ hours of tapes have been opened, because unlike other sets of presidential papers, Watergate-related congressional legislation and a web of litigation have prevented the release for research of a vast majority of the least controversial of this unique collection of Nixon White House documents and tapes. As Watergate events unfolded in 1973 and 1974, questions about access to, and protection of, documents generated by the Nixon administration assumed prominence. In May 1973, both presidential counselor Leonard Garment and Elliot Richardson, then Attorney General, advised Nixon to place the papers of H. R. Haldeman, John Ehrlichman, and John Dean under the protection of the FBI. Nixon agreed on the condition that there be no access to these papers "without written presidential consent." Executive privilege became the issue of the day as Congress demanded and the President refused to produce those records and tapes deemed pivotal for the resolution of an unprecedented national constitutional crisis. Although the courts ultimately overruled Nixon's claims of executive privilege during the course of the various Watergate investigations, after Nixon left office he signed an agreement with Arthur Sampson, head of the General Services Administration (GSA), that mandated the destruction of the tapes and allowed considerable opportunity for destruction of some presidential papers as well. This September 1974 Nixon-Sampson agreement came into existence when the National Archives and Records Service (NARS) was under the jurisdiction of GSA, and so the Archivist of the United States had not been involved in its negotiation.

The Nixon-Sampson agreement created an archival firestorm that swept through both the halls of Congress and the scholarly community of researchers. Signed without the knowledge of the National Archives, it not only gave Nixon wide latitude in controlling access to the papers of his controversial administration, but also left in doubt whether they would ever be donated through the National Archives to a presidential library and made available for study, as had the papers of all other occupants of the White House since Herbert Hoover. Never before had the preservation of an entire documentary record of a single administration become an issue of national scholarly and journalistic concern; never before had access to records been so personalized for the American public.

In the immediate wake of the President's resignation over Watergate, criticism of the Nixon-Sampson agreement predictably resulted in unparalleled congressional action. In December 1974, President Gerald Ford approved legislation dramatically altering the control that previous Presidents had exercised over materials produced during their time in office, thus ultimately producing new archival procedures for processing such papers. This 1974 Presidential Recordings and Materials Preservation Act: 1) authorized the seizing of all Nixon documents and tapes, placing them in control of the federal government; and 2) mandated that any abuse-of-power information in this presidential material be made available to the public as soon as possible. Consequently, federal archivists of the National Archives and Records Service of the GSA (now an independent agency known as the National Archives and Records Administration, or NARA) began to establish guidelines for reviewing all of the documents and tapes from the White House Central Files.

This review process was complicated by the fact that the 1974 Act was not exclusive; that is, it included both the official and the unofficial Nixon material in the government's custody. This has meant that archivists have had to cull from these presidential papers all private and personal material relating solely to the President's family or other nonpublic activities, including "private political associations." The latter category proved particularly troublesome in the processing of not only the "Special Files," but also for the bulk of the Central Files as well, because most of the Nixon documents have some political content and few are concerned exclusively with the private political association of the person who wrote or received the document. The new review process has also delayed the release of Nixon-related material. Since FDR, major portions of the papers of other modern presidents have been opened within a half-dozen years after the end of their terms in office, but the least controversial materials from the Nixon years have languished unprocessed, in part because of this extremely complicated and litigious review process.

For three years Nixon challenged the 1974 Act in the courts to prevent the release of the Special Files. Ironically, this Special Files Unit had been originally created in September 1972 within the Nixon White House to provide a separate storage location for documents removed from the Central Files and selected staff members' offices because they were considered "sensitive." They included the complete files of the staff secretary, the President's Office, and the offices of H. R. Haldeman, John Ehrlichman, John Dean, and Charles Colson.

In 1977, after the Supreme Court upheld the 1974 Presidential Recordings and Materials Act as constitutional, it took another two years for attorneys representing the former President and federal archivists to work out an agreement permitting NARA to systematically screen and prepare for research purposes the Special Files and the White House tapes. In February 1979, this unusual "negotiated agreement" called for the permanent removal of "any political document in the files that did not have a direct connection to the President's constitutional powers or statutory duties" and the return of these documents to Nixon with the understanding that "he would donate them in the future to the National Archives." Because of these and other unique procedures, the processing of the Nixon papers did not begin until five years after he resigned as President.

Since that time, Nixon and/or his key aides have brought additional suits attempting to prevent the opening of documents in these controversial Special Files. In the interim, archivists have reduced the volume of the Nixon Special Files by six percent; legal representatives of the former President and members of his administration have withdrawn another ten percent. Although users can request mandatory reviews of both sets of winnowed material, the historical record of the Nixon administration has at least temporarily been diminished. In the event that some of these documents are reviewed once again by federal archivists, the former President can still challenge their release through the courts. Thus the specter of protracted litigation still hangs over these contested pages.

Subsequent to the 1979 "negotiated agreement," NARA drafted six sets of regulations under which both the most sensitive materials, along with the most commonplace ones from the voluminous Nixon White House Central Files, would be processed. Previous sets had been revised or dropped because of congressional or legal actions. Before obtaining approval in 1986 from the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) to publish the sixth set in the Federal Register, the National Archives was given a Justice Department memorandum, attached to but not published with these regulations, that unequivocally stated that Nixon could still invoke executive privilege over these documents, and that President Ronald Reagan or any future sitting President would have to honor the claim without reviewing the merits. Litigation on this memorandum was still pending in March 1988.

The 4,000 hours of tape recordings pose even thornier archival and access problems. It would take a single person almost two years of non-stop listening for eight hours a day just to hear all of the tapes without taking time to review or analyze them. Although NARA has basically completed processing the tapes and prepared a 27,000-page finding aid for researchers, lawyers for Nixon and some of his top advisers claim that untold numbers of violations of the personal privacy of individuals remain. They argue that the review process agreed to in the 1979 "negotiated agreement" has not been proven feasible with respect to those controversial secret tapings, and that, therefore, they should be reviewed again using stricter privacy standards.

In the unlikely event that no further legal barriers are encountered, sometime during 1991 the National Archives intends to open those recorded conversations that the Watergate special prosecutor requested (not all of these were used as evidence and, hence, were made public in various court cases after 1974). After these initial eighty hours of special prosecutor tapes are opened, NARA will follow its regulations and release additional segments, similar to the manner in which the first Special Files documents began to be released sequentially in 1987. This means that all persons mentioned in the recordings who have requested that they be notified in advance will be, in the event they would want to file charges against the release of specific conversations. Thus, even with the Tape Survey Log, researchers face many delays and obstacles before they will be able to analyze and interpret this unique documentary source—the White House tapes.

Other unusual characteristics of the Nixon presidential papers involve the subject matter of the records released to date and contained in various parts of the microfiche editions published by University Publications of America. The first is that most of the obvious abuse-of-power documents had already been presented as evidence and made public when various Nixon aides and their staff members were tried in the last half of the 1970s. Consequently, journalists, but not historians, were generally disappointed and confused by the release of the first records from the White House Central Files, because they did not contain sensational revelations. The initial 1.5 million pages of documents opened in December 1986 focused on domestic subject files ranging from welfare and environmental issues to Supreme Court appointments and desegregation of schools. These files are of enormous historic, if not headline, value to aid in understanding the formulation of the major domestic policies of the one-and-one-half Nixon administrations.

Secondly, those papers released in May and July 1987 consisted of 1.5 million documents that make up the total volume of the Special Files. These were purported to be of particular importance to the abuse-of-power question, but have not yet revealed any significant information about the Watergate break-in or its cover-up that had not already been presented as evidence in court cases in the 1970s. The first opening in May, for example, included five major file groups of papers relating to the work in the White House of John Dean, Harry Dent, John Ehrlichman, Egil Krogh, and Gordon Strachan.

The second opening in May contained 267,500 papers actually created or seen by Richard Nixon during his tenure in office. These included both the President's Office Files, with notations in Nixon's handwriting, and "Personal Files" for 1969–1974, in addition to segments of the papers of Desmond J. Barker, Jr. (2,500 pages); Patrick J. Buchanan (22,500 pages); Dwight L. Chapin (35,000 pages); Peter M. Flanigan (12,500 pages); David R. Gergen (2,500 pages); General Alexander M. Haig, Jr. (40,000 pages); Kenneth L. Khachigian (25,000 pages); Herbert G. Klein (5,000 pages); Tom C. Korologos (2,500 pages); Frederic V. Malek (2,500 pages); John A. Scali (5,000 pages); Gerald L. Warren (2,500 pages); David R. Young, Jr. (22,500 pages); and Ronald L. Ziegler (42,500 pages).

At the July 1987 opening, 823,450 more papers from the Special Files were released, consisting of 353,600 pages created or maintained by Nixon's Chief of Staff H. R. Haldeman and 108,800 pages by Special Counsel Charles Colson. Other segments opened at the same time included: John R. Brown III (2,400 pages); Stephen B. Bull (4,000 pages); Alexander P. Butterfield (10,000 pages); J. Fred Buzhardt (4,000 pages); Michael J. Farrell (1,600 pages); Edwin L. Harper (800 pages); David C. Hoopes (25,000 pages); W. Richard Howard (5,000 pages); Peter E. Millspaugh (1,600 pages); Terrence O'Donnell (1,600 pages); Peter G. Peterson (2,400 pages); Geoffrey C. Shepard (2,400 pages); Hugh W. Sloan, Jr. (1,610 pages); Richard C. Tufaro (2,000 pages); J. Bruce Whelihan (8,400 pages); and David G. Wilson (1,600 pages).

Thirdly, these first historic openings of the Nixon presidential papers are but the tip of the iceberg for researching this controversial and important administration, especially its best known activity outside of Watergate, namely, foreign policy. Unfortunately, national security considerations have prevented any systematic declassification of materials pertaining to Nixon's record in the field of foreign affairs. Despite the publicity it receives, the Freedom of Information Act is not an adequate historical tool for obtaining the necessary aggregate data to document the decision-making processes involved in formulating U.S. diplomacy for Nixon's or any other recent administration. Moreover, the National Security Council, responsible for declassification of most foreign policy documents, has not yet concentrated on the Nixon years. To make matters worse for those interested in studying the diplomacy of the United States from 1969 through 1974, crucial foreign policy advisers such as Henry Kissinger and Alexander

Haig have established personal monopolies over both public and private documents they generated by depositing them with the Library of Congress, thus making them subject to more severe restrictions than now govern Nixon's papers.

Finally, the question of the establishment of a Nixon Presidential Library remains problematic fourteen years after the thirty-seventh President resigned under a constitutional cloud of unprecedented proportions. After several major academic institutions turned down offers for housing the papers of what will become the most completely documented U.S. administration, the former President first decided to build his library in the seaside town of San Clemente, California, once the site of the western White House. Then, in November 1987, it was announced that the $25 million complex would be built in the southern California town of Yorba Linda, where Nixon was born in 1913. While ground-breaking is still tentatively scheduled to take place in 1988, no agreement has been reached with the government about housing the Nixon presidential papers there.

As of the end of 1987, the Richard M. Nixon Presidential Archives Foundation planned to build a library that would be entirely independent of the National Archives, unlike all the other presidential libraries in the country. Until the resultant stalemate between the government and Nixon's representatives is resolved, his presidential papers will remain in federal custody at the NARA facility in Alexandria, Virginia. This means that the Nixon Presidential Library will contain primarily his post-presidential papers (the bulk of his vice presidential papers have long since been donated to the federal government) and assorted family material.

The Nixon Presidency

The delays encountered in opening the Nixon White House Central Files is particularly unfortunate in light of historical inquiry into an administration that may well be the most significant one since World War II and one of the most important in this entire century. Richard Milhous Nixon became President of the United States at a crucial juncture in American history. Following the Second World War there was general agreement between popular and elite opinion on two things; the effectiveness of most New Deal domestic policies and the necessity of most Cold War foreign policies. During the 1960s, however, these two crucial postwar consensual constructs began to break down, and the war in Indochina, with its disruptive impact on the nation's political economy, hastened their disintegration. By 1968 the tradition bipartisan, Cold War approach to the conduct of foreign affairs had been seriously undermined. Similarly, the "bigger and better" New Deal approach to the modern welfare state had reached a point of diminishing returns even among liberals.

A breakdown in either the foreign or domestic policy consensus offers both opportunity and danger to any incumbent President. Nixon had more opportunity for risk-taking changes at home and abroad during his first administration than he would have had if elected in 1960, when he was narrowly defeated by John F. Kennedy, because of the disruptive impact of war and domestic reforms during the intervening eight years. Also, he inherited a wartime presidency, with all of its temporarily enhanced extralegal powers. Although Nixon was a wartime President for all but twenty months of his five-and-one-half years in office, he found that impunity for constitutional violations that was often accorded previous wartime presidents was not to be his.

Periods of war and reform have usually alternated in the United States, but in the 1960s they burgeoned simultaneously, hastening the breakdown of consensus that was evident by the 1968 election. This unusual situation transformed Nixon's largely unexamined and rather commonplace management views into controversial ones. It also reinforced his natural predilection for bringing about change through executive fiat. This historical confluence of war and reform accounted in part for many of Nixon's unilateral administrative actions during his first administration, and for some of the events leading to his disgrace over the Watergate cover-up and resignation during his second term.

Because much of the press and both Democratic-controlled houses of Congress were suspicious of him in 1969, Nixon almost automatically viewed administrative action as one way of obtaining significant domestic reform. Moreover, some of his initial accomplishments in administratively redirecting U.S. foreign policy ultimately led Nixon to rely more on executive actions at home to accomplish certain domestic goals than he might have otherwise. In any case, this approach drew criticism from those who already distrusted his past and presumed present policies and priorities. Nixon's covert and overt expansion and prolongation of the war during his first term also reinforced existing suspicions about his personality and political ethics. In this sense, liberal paranoia about his domestic programs fueled Nixon's paranoia about liberal opposition to the war and vice versa.

By 1972, Nixon's success in effecting structural and substantive change in foreign policy through the exercise of largely unilateral executive power increasingly led him to think that he could use the same preemptive administrative approach to resolving domestic problems, especially following his landslide electoral victory that year. By the time he resigned from office in 1974, Nixon had effected significant structural changes in the organization of the executive branch of government—many of which are still in place. For example, he replaced the Department of the Post Office with a public corporation theoretically less subject to political patronage; merged the Peace Corps and Vista into one agency called Action; and created five new domestic advisory boards: the Urban Affairs Council that circuitously evolved into the Domestic Council; the Council on Environmental Quality (this was established at the initiative of Congress, but was effectively staffed and utilized by Nixon); the Rural Affairs Council; the Council on Executive Reorganization; and the Council on International Economic Policy (CIEP).

The Nixon administration also established the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) and recommended that the functions of the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) be divided into two new agencies—the Nuclear Regulatory Commission and the Energy Research and Development Administration, both of which came into existence under President Gerald Ford. The Nixon administration also created the Office of Child Development and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration. With Nixon's approval the Bureau of the Budget was transformed into the Office of Management and Budget, whose monitoring and investigative powers gave it greater influence than ever before on the budgets of all government agencies and departments. Although Nixon tried to implement certain reorganizational (and ideological) ideas by temporarily impounding federal funds and attempting to abolish the Office of Economic Opportunity, federal courts subsequently ruled against these actions.

Probably the most important reorganizational activity of the Nixon administration involved the National Security Council (NSC). With Nixon's strong encouragement, Henry Kissinger transformed the NSC system into a personal foreign policy secretariat within the White House. As head of the reformed and revitalized NSC, Kissinger occupied the "super-official" position of assistant to the President for national security affairs, with more powers than those who, since Eisenhower's presidency, had served as special assistants for national security affairs. Ultimately, Kissinger chaired six special committees operating just below the NSC level, including the controversial Committee of 40, which oversaw all covert CIA activity abroad.

The reorganized NSC also created a conceptual framework for formulating U.S. foreign policy by establishing a series of National Security Study Memoranda (NSSMs). These were drafted by NSC staff and signed by Nixon or by Kissinger on behalf of the President. The NSSMs directed various agencies and interdepartmental groups within the government to prepare detailed policy or "area" options, not policy recommendations, which were then passed on by Kissinger to members of the National Security Council, who sometimes argued over them in Nixon's presence. However, since these "formal options" were written, Nixon did not always need them orally debated by the NSC.

Nixon seems to have relied most heavily on these NSSMs in his first two years in office and less so in subsequent years. The NSSM system was designed to prevent the State Department and other executive departments from becoming advocates of particular policies by relegating them to the roles of analysts rather than policymakers. According to political scientist Alexander George, this "Nixinger" system for formulating foreign policy became the "most centralized and highly structured model yet employed by any American President." It is this system with minor variations that is still operative almost twenty years after its creation.

It is sometimes said that, when Nixon created the Urban Affairs Council (UAC) with its colorful executive secretary Patrick Moynihan, this made Moynihan the Henry Kissinger of domestic policy, because the UAC was presumably based on the emerging NSC model. Such a comparison has proven misleading for a number of reasons, not the least of which was Moynihan's lack of attention to management skills. Moreover, Moynihan's presence in the White House was always tenuous than Kissinger's, not only because he was a Democrat, but also because Nixon had appointed as counselor to the President for domestic affairs, Arthur Burns, whose views opposed and often neutralized those of the head of the UAC.

Despite the lack of centralization that characterized the structure for formulating foreign policy, Nixon's first administration actively pursued five areas of domestic reform: welfare, civil rights, economic and environmental policy, and reorganization of the federal government. In all these areas, even though his welfare reform failed to pass Congress, Nixon's positive domestic programs may be remembered longer than his currently better known foreign policy activities, because fewer of them have been dismantled or neglected by his successors in the White House.

Obviously, the domestic record of Richard Milhous Nixon will forever remain tarnished by a negative series of events, including wiretaps, the creation of the "plumbers" unit within the White House to plug information leaks and ultimately to conduct break-ins, the harassment of individuals on an "enemies" list, the misuse of the CIA to infiltrate and investigate a variety of protest organizations, and temporary consideration given to the "Houston Plan," which would have institutionalized surveillance of suspect groups and individuals. These events climaxed with the Watergate break-ins in May and June 1972 and the subsequent attempts by the President and his closest aides to cover up these and other illegal acts.

While Watergate was probably an accident waiting to happen, given the "hardball" nature of U.S. politics by 1972, this does not excuse the break-ins or the cover-up that resulted in a President of the United States resigning before he could be impeached for obstructing justice. However, if historians or other students of the American presidency continue to insist that Richard Nixon was an aberration, rather than an all too common product of the American political system, as a people we will have learned little from Watergate. It is time to reevaluate, rather than simply rehash the positive as well as the negative lessons from the administration of the thirty-seventh President of the United States. This microfiche edition of the first papers released from the Nixon White House Central Files makes such a scholarly reevaluation possible outside the facilities of the National Archives in Washington, D.C., and Alexandria, Virginia.

INTRODUCTION TO DOCUMENTS ANNOTATED BY THE PRESIDENT

Researchers will find that the documents in Series A. Documents Annotated by the President, 1969-1974 cover numerous issues and subjects. Though no one topic is fully documented in this collection, this material derives its significance from the fact that President Richard Nixon considered these documents important. Of the mountain of paper that crossed his desk, President Nixon took the time to make marginal notes and highlight certain passages on these documents. The annotations were then used by the President to institute action by his staff. The documents in this collection reveal not only the interests of Richard Nixon but in addition his reaction to policy, programs, individuals, and the news.

The materials that comprise Papers of the Nixon White House Part 6. The President's Office Files are from the Special Files series of records at the Nixon Presidential Materials Project in Alexandria, Virginia. The Special Files Unit was created in September 1972 to provide a central storage location for sensitive material. Early in 1970, John R. Brown III, special assistant to the President and staff secretary, had conducted a review of the handling procedures for all presidential papers. His report was contained in a memorandum to H.R. Haldeman, dated March 25, 1970. In it, Brown recommended the immediate establishment of a special files unit to handle the storage of all sensitive material, material of a personal nature, and material containing the President's handwriting. The consolidation of these files into a central location would, according to his recommendation, tighten up the procedures for handling presidential papers. Two years later, the Nixon administration acted on the recommendations by establishing, within the White House complex, a special files unit that was completely independent of the White House Central Files unit.

To ensure the utmost security, the number of individuals who worked in the Special Files Unit was intentionally kept at a minimum. Gertrude Brown Fry, who was staff assistant for security, was appointed to supervise the new White House unit. Her assistant was Hazel F. Fulton, who had been a confidential assistant to Peter M. Flanigan, assistant to the President.

Prior to the establishment of the Special Files, much of the sensitive material generated by the White House staff was not forwarded to the White House Central Files for general storage, but was dispersed throughout the White House complex and held by individual staff members in their own offices. Following the decision to set up Special Files, John W. Dean III, counsel to the President, instructed Fry and Fulton to receive, index, and file all sensitive White House staff materials. They were also provided criteria to use in making determinations about items to include in Special Files. According to the criteria there were twelve groups of files that warranted special care and handling: investigative reports on individuals; applications and recommendations for positions; documents that contained derogatory remarks concerning the character, loyalty, integrity, or ability of individuals; documents relating to personal, family, or financial affairs of individuals; documents that contained information that could be used to harass living persons or relatives of recently deceased persons; information prejudicial to the national security; information prejudicial to foreign relations; communications addressed to the President in confidence, the immediate publication of which would result in discouraging confidential communications to a President in the future; documents that pertained to the President's personal, family, business, and financial affairs; security-classified information; documents specifically restricted by the President; and politically sensitive information or documents. With these instructions Fry proceeded to set up, organize, and manage the Special Files.

The first materials received by this new White House unit were the President's handwriting files (The President's handwriting files is the series that has been microfiched as Series A. Documents Annotated by the President, 1969-1974. UPA renamed the series in order to more accurately reflect what is in the file. In addition there are other series including Series B. Daily News Summaries Annotated by the President, 1969-1974 that contain presidential handwriting.) All documentation annotated by the President was considered sensitive and was forwarded to the Special Files. Within the Special Files a subfile was created entitled the President's Office Files which contains the following series: President's Handwriting, 1969-1974; News Summaries, 1969-1974; President's Meetings File, 1969-1974 (UPA has published this series as Papers of the Nixon White House, Part 2); and three small administrative files.

Series A is made up of memoranda, reports, newspaper clippings, and correspondence. The majority of the documentation in this series comes from White House staff members, though a significant number also comes from federal departments and agencies, and Congress. The documents are arranged in strictly chronological order. Subjects vary widely in this series from major administration policy to social events. In order to find specific topics, the researcher should consult the subject index at the back of this guide.

The documents that comprise Series A are a unique collection in themselves even without the presidential annotations. There are numerous high level policy memoranda that illuminate reasons behind major policy decisions. In addition the many documents on the activities of President Nixon give an insider's view to the complex life of a modern American President; a view hidden behind what is recorded by the television news cameras.

President Nixon's handwritten notes are both refreshing in their frankness and an insight into the man that becomes lost when presidential thoughts are reduced to formal documents. Because these documents were for limited internal White House use only, the President could feel free to express himself clearly. A few samples will show the significance of this series.

Memorandum for the President

from Bryce N. Harlow. December 6, 1969.

[This note from Harlow is an analysis of congressmen who did not co-sponsor the Wright Resolution and those senators who did not sign the letter to Henry Cabot Lodge supporting the President's Vietnam peace plan. These two Congressional acts were made in response to Nixon's November 3rd nationally televised address outlining his Vietnam policy and calling for the country's support.]

[Nixon note for Bryce Harlow and Harry S. Dent]

Now what we need is an analysis of these Dems [Democrats] who failed to support [my Vietnam peace plan]-who might be vulnerable in their Districts or States in '70 [the 1970 election.]

The number one issue in the country at the end of 1969 was the Vietnam War. The war had destroyed President Johnson's administration, and Nixon realized he would need all of the support possible in order to conclude the war without losing his conservative electoral base. Crucial to this support would be the Congress. Therefore, reacting as a politician, Nixon's solution to those opposed to his policies was to try to defeat them at the polls.

1. But after OEO—take nothing for granted
2. get idea across that a no vote would reduce our SALT negotiating position.
3. Also emphasize new intelligence showing greater Soviet ICBM progress.

Here are two classic strategies used by Presidents to lobby Congress on national security programs. The first is to forecast a diminished ability to negotiate on arms control without the passage of funding for a major new weapons system. This strategy was used very effectively by President Reagan for his Strategic Defense Initiative. The second technique is to make available new intelligence information which shows greater military capability from an adversary, therefore necessitating the additional funding. Both of these methods have proved effective for many Presidents.

Memorandum for the President

from Daniel P. Moynihan. May 8, 1970.

[This memo and an attached report entitled "The Concept of Public Policy in the 1970's" by Daniel P. Moynihan is a think piece on public policy. Moynihan reviews how domestic affairs had been driven by programs, and how, during the Nixon administration, domestic affairs was being handled like foreign affairs by developing policies. This was being accomplished by the creation of a number of high level groups like the Domestic Council, which were to consider domestic policy in the same manner as the National Security Council reviewed foreign policy.]

[Nixon note to Patrick Buchanan]

A very perceptive piece-

We must proceed in this direction or we will end up with a hodge podge of programs - perpetuated by the bureaucracy and with no central purpose.

It should be noted that the creation of these high level policy groups, in addition to setting executive branch policy, also centralized policymaking within the White House. This control by the White House was especially important to a President who believed that the federal bureaucracy, containing numerous Democratic holdovers from the Kennedy and Johnson years, was hostile to its administration.

Here is another side of Richard Nixon that is not often discussed.

SAMPLE #5.

Memorandum for the President

from John D. Ehrlichman. January 11, 1971.

[This is a follow-up report to a presidential meeting with the Urban League regarding black Americans.]

[Nixon note for John Ehrlichman and Leonard Garment]

E + Len

But when are we going to get some real publicity on what we have done? We have been doing good things in this field for 2 years - with no credit— Our major effort in the next 2 years should be on the publicity side.

The Nixon White House was much concerned with its image and how the media was covering its activities. President Nixon obviously believed that his administration had a good record on civil rights but that this record was not being reported. With elections approaching in 1972 and support weak in the black electorate the President in this note urges his staff to enhance his image on civil rights.

SAMPLE #6.

Memorandum for the President.

from John Dean. January 5, 1972.

[President Nixon's son-in-law David Eisenhower had become involved with political activities for the reelection of the President. John Dean points out that because David is still in the Navy this activity should be curtailed.]

[Nixon note to John Dean]

Dean

Have a discreet talk with David alone on this - Don't make a big issue of it.

Here is another insight into Richard Nixon who, in this matter, instructs an aide to discuss with a family member their activities in the reelection campaign. The President could have dealt with this issue directly with his son-in-law but instead delegates to John Dean the duty to tell David to stop campaigning.

SAMPLE #7.

Memorandum for the Staff Secretary from Edward Morgan. January 14, 1972.

[This memo discusses the Richmond, Virginia School decision which merged the public schools of the City of Richmond with a 70 per cent black student population with those of Henrico and Chesterfield counties with a 90 percent white student population to achieve racial balance.]

[Nixon note]

1. Be sure the Judge being a Johnson [Lyndon B. Johnson] man gets out.
2. Keep Administration out of such cases as much as possible.
3. Find a Constitutional or Legislative remedy we can be for—in early summer or late spring so that we can defense the issue.

School busing was the most important and controversial civil rights issue during Nixon's term in office. This solution to school segregation due to white flight and the concentration of racial populations within geographic locations was denounced by the majority of white southerners as well as some blacks. The school busing plans were handed down by the federal courts and were to be enforced by the administration. Nixon wanted no responsibility for busing to be associated with his administration, especially in an election year where the President hoped to win most of the southern states. To insure southern support the administration would blame the courts for busing courts whose judges in most cases were appointed during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations; keep federal involvement in these cases to a minimum and any activity at a low profile; and find a constitutional or legislative argument that the administration could stand for or behind for the actions it had to take.

This collection can be used by researchers for both the study of individual topics covered by the documents as well as Richard Nixon the President and the man.

USER INSTRUCTIONS

The instructions below describe the scope and organization of the collection, the accession numbering system used, and information elements and suggested uses of the Bibliography of Documents and Index by Subjects and Names.

SCOPE AND ORGANIZATION OF THE COLLECTION

University Publications of America (UPA) has begun a major microform publication series of the textual records that are being opened by the Nixon Presidential Materials Projects, National Archives and Records Administration, titled Papers of the Nixon White House and edited by Professor Joan Hoff-Wilson. To date UPA has completed seven parts of the series:

- Part 1. Official Inventories of Papers and Other Historical Materials of the Nixon White House.
- Part 2. The President's Meeting File, 1969-1974.
- Part 3. John Ehrlichman: Notes of Meetings with the President, 1969-1973.
- Part 4. The John Ehrlichman Alphabetical Subject File, 1969-1973.
- Part 5. H. R. Haldeman: Notes of White House Meetings, 1969-1973.
- Part 6. Series A. President's Office Files. Documents Annotated by the President, 1969-1974.
- Part 6. Series B. President's Office Files. Daily News Summaries Annotated by the President, 1969-1973.

The documents annotated by the President, 1969-1974 which comprise Part 6, Series A of this series are part of the White House Special Files, President's Office Files. The White House during the Nixon administration kept two parallel filing systems; the Central Files and Special Files. The Special Files was established to maintain especially sensitive materials and was administered by politically loyal White House staffers. The Central Files which is the normal filing system for the White House is run by professional civil service personnel. All of the President's Office Files were kept in the Special Files.

The President's Handwriting File renamed the Documents Annotated by the President, 1969-1974 series has been reproduced for this publication. The documents are arranged chronologically. Researchers should refer to the Index by Subjects and Names portion of this printed publication to locate documents on a particular subject.

The documentation found in this collection include memoranda, correspondence, reports, printed material, and newspaper clippings. The items on microfiche number 346 through 377 are cross reference sheets. These sheets indicate where a document in this series had been originally filed or should have been filed in the White House Central Files. A carbon copy of these cross reference sheets were filed in the Central Files in place of the document. The sheets are alphabetically arranged by name or subject. This method of cross referencing was not done thoroughly, and a number of documents in the series have no sheet. However, when available they can be helpful to a researcher who wishes to find additional documentation on a subject found in this publication.

UPA has microfilmed this entire series.

ACCESSION NUMBERS

Each document has been assigned a single accession number for reference purposes in the Bibliography and Index sections and is keyed directly to the location of the document within the companion microfiche collection. The first element of the accession number indicates that the document may be located in Part 6, Series A of the series entitled Papers of the Nixon White House, the middle element identifies the number of the microfiche card on which the notes of the document may be found, and the third element pinpoints the exact frame (01-70) on the microfiche where the document begins.

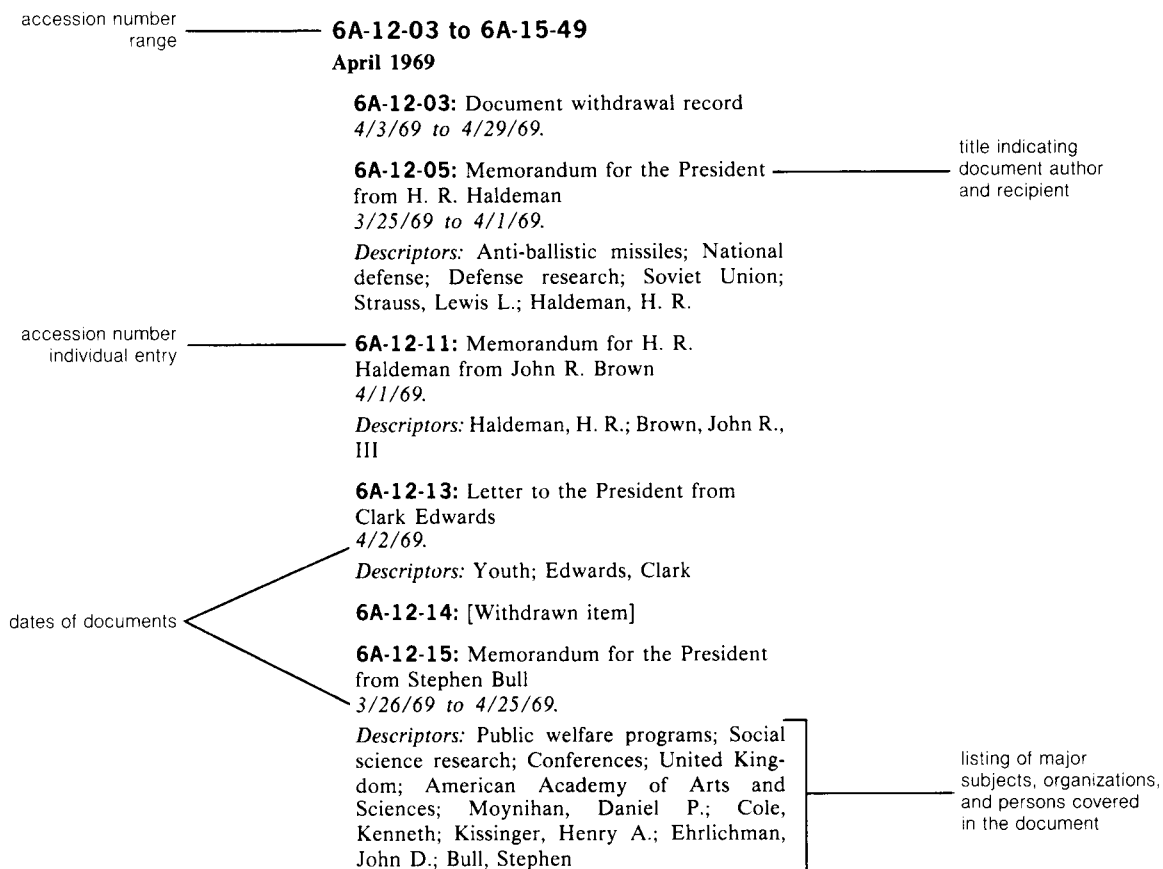

The first and second elements of the accession number are eye visible on each microfiche card; the third element (frame number) may be viewed below the frame itself. These elements are illustrated in the sample provided below.

Sample Microfiche and Accession Number

Sample Entries: Bibliography of Documents

FICHE 12 TO FICHE 15

BIBLIOGRAPHY OF DOCUMENTS

All items in the microfiche collection are described individually in the Bibliography of Documents.

Titles indicating the type of document and its author and recipient immediately follow the document accession number. The date or range of dates is provided for each individual entry.

The subject descriptors listing serves to characterize the nature and scope of the document. Also, because they correspond to the subject terms under which the document will be found in the index section, the descriptors can be used as references for finding additional items of similar subject matter.

The descriptors section lists all subjects, organizations, and persons that are subjects of the documents.

INDEX BY SUBJECTS AND NAMES

The Index by Subjects and Names provides access by (1) major subject matter of the documents; including persons and organizations; (2) names of persons who are authors or recipients of documents.

Entries in this index consist of the following structural elements:

- terms;
- title;
- document date or date range;
- accession number assigned to each indexed document and used to identify that document in the Bibliography of Documents and the microfiche collection;
- cross references (see and see also).

Subject Terms and Cross-References

Documents are indexed to the key subject concepts covered in a particular document. Subject terms and cross-references used in the Index by Subjects and Names are based upon an extensively cross-referenced hierarchical indexing vocabulary developed specifically to handle the Nixon White House materials.

When indexing a document to which a hierarchy of these terms might apply, we select the most specific applicable term or terms, and usually do not also index to the broader or narrower referencing terms that, while relevant, do not reflect as well the specific topic of discussion. For example, a document focusing specifically on "School busing" would not also be indexed to the more general term "Discrimination in education." It is important, therefore, to pursue relevant see also references under a term, as these generally list additional documents not identified under the broader term. See references direct the user from terminology that has not been used in our controlled vocabulary thesaurus to the specific form of the subject term we have used.

Personal and Organization Names

Names of all persons and organizations who are authors or recipients of documents are included in the Index by Subjects and Names along with names of persons and organizations that are the subject of significant discussion.

Names of all persons except the President may be located in the Index by Subjects and Names.

Alphabetization and Sorting of References

Index terms are alphabetized on a word-by-word and letter-by-letter basis, observing spaces but ignoring punctuation. Thus, "Water pollution" precedes "Watergate affair." Therefore, it is important to know where there are word breaks in a term.

WITHDRAWALS

There have been extensive withdrawals from the Nixon papers. Documents have been withdrawn by both the National Archives and Records Administration and by representatives of former President Richard M. Nixon. "Document Withdrawal Records" have been inserted at the beginning of each affected folder enumerating all withdrawn materials. Items withdrawn by the National Archives are identified by an arabic number, and those withdrawn by Nixon's representatives are identified by an arabic number preceded by a capital N. Additionally, pages showing the original locations of the withdrawn materials have been inserted within the folders.

Withdrawal records list the document type, subject/title or correspondents, date, and restriction code. Each withdrawal has been assigned one of the following restriction codes:

- A. Release would violate a Federal statute
- B. Document contains national security classified information
- C. Release would violate an individual's rights
- D. Release would disclose trade secrets or confidential commercial or financial information
- E. Release would disclose investigatory information compiled for law enforcement purposes
- F. Document containing private and personal material has been withdrawn and returned
- G. Document containing non-historical material has been withdrawn and returned

Both "Document Withdrawal Records" and pages showing withdrawal locations have been microfilmed in the UPA collection and are noted in the companion finding aid. A separate entry has been created for each withdrawal record and individual items that have been withdrawn are identified in the Bibliography of Documents.

The withdrawn materials are under review by the National Archives and Records Administration and as withdrawn materials are released UPA will issue supplements to the microfiche collection and will update the bibliography and indexes to reflect the additional material.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

UPA would like to thank the staff of the Nixon Presidential Materials Project, National Archives and Records Administration for their cooperation on this publication. The staff is both knowledgeable about the Nixon papers in their care, and articulate and forthcoming with that knowledge.
