INTRODUCTION

The Council on Foreign Relations was founded in 1921 by businessmen, bankers, and lawyers determined to keep the United States engaged in the world. Today, the council is composed of men and women from all walks of international life and from all parts of America, dedicated to the belief that the nation's peace and prosperity are firmly linked to that of the rest of the world. From this flows the council's mission: to foster America's understanding of other nations—their peoples, cultures, histories, hopes, quarrels, and ambitions—and thus to serve our nation through study and debate, private and public.

The council is a national membership organization and think tank with headquarters in New York, offices in Washington, D.C., and programs nationwide. Its widely respected and influential research staff—with backgrounds in government and scholarship in most international subjects—regularly meets with council members and other leaders and thinkers. These exclusive sessions, known as study groups or roundtables, form the council's intellectual core. The aim is to provide insights into international affairs and to develop new ideas for U.S. foreign policy, particularly national security and foreign economic policy. Council Fellows produce books, articles, and op-ed pieces and regularly contribute expert commentary on television and radio.

The council also publishes Foreign Affairs, the leading periodical in the field. This magazine has been host to the most important articles about world affairs in this century.

The council's 3,600 members are divided almost equally among New York, Washington, D.C., and the rest of the nation. They include nearly all current and former senior U.S. government officials who deal with international matters; renowned scholars; and leaders of business, media, human rights, humanitarian, and other nongovernmental groups. Council members choose new members, who aim to educate themselves and then others. The council is host to the widest possible range of views and advocates of none. It cultivates an atmosphere of nonpartisanship and non-ideological engagement among members and staff. The views expressed in council-sponsored independent task force reports, by members of study groups, or in articles in Foreign Affairs are solely the responsibility of the respective authors or groups.

This tradition of impartiality enables the council to gather contending voices for serious and civil debate and discussion. That special convening power is unique in American society.

A Survey of the Archives of the Council on Foreign Relations

By William Diebold

Variety is one of the attractions of the archives of the Council on Foreign Relations for the years 1922–1951, but their full range cannot be captured in a few pages. Comprising both detailed and summary accounts, the records taken as a whole are very lengthy and full of material that will be of interest to the public. Readers will differ according to their interests as to which are the gems—but there are many.

Some of these microfiche carry statements by important people at important moments while others, often more interesting, report what people said before they became prominent. In 1931, for example, as a young member of the Canadian Department of External Affairs, Lester Pearson gave a statement of Canadian attitudes toward the United States that would have sounded well years later when he became prime minister. Questions of prominence aside, the archives record the changes—and also the elements of continuity—in the concerns of Americans from business, government, journalism, and academic life, and often foreigners as well. Except for a few public dinners—such as those for Ramsay MacDonald in 1929 and Maxim Litvinov in 1942—the council sessions were private and off the record. Consequently, some people said things they would never have said in public; others remained as open (or reticent) in private as they were when they could be quoted. Naturally, there are also accounts of meetings in which uninteresting people said uninteresting things about uninteresting subjects—but that is the nature of archives.

The archives focus on American foreign policy, from Warren G. Harding to Harry S. Truman. That is a many-sided subject so the records deal with economic, political, military, legal, geographic, and other matters—and sometimes personalities. Government policies of the day are frequently criticized and sometimes supported while new policies are advocated with great freedom and often great learning. Some discussions are very broad-gauged and deal with fundamentals; others dig into the details as study groups try to help scholars break new ground or small groups of specialists argue about emerging issues they expect will become important. (Some do and some do not.) The long-run and the immediate future both come into the picture. There are discussions of how to prevent a war, how to stay out of it, how to win it, and what to do with a victorious peace. As great as the coverage is, there are also maddening gaps. That, too, is inevitable in the archives of an organization that had limited resources and an almost infinite subject to consider.

Almost every part of the world provides a focus at one time or another since the staff and members of the council knew that American policy could only make sense if it was based on an informed judgment of what was happening abroad. One finds high foreign officials defending their actions while at other sessions private citizens from the same countries criticize the policies of their governments. Americans add their criticisms, often buttressed by vivid accounts of their experiences, some as businessmen dealing with antagonistic foreign governments, others as journalists coping with censors or visiting battlefields. Military men recount their activities, sometimes behind enemy lines, and diplomats describe their successes and failures. Allen Dulles, for example, tells how he made his way to Switzerland to set up spy headquarters, and Robert Murphy tells of the secret visit he and Mark Clark made to North Africa. At almost all meetings and discussions there were experts whose probing of what is going on below the surface throws interesting light on the knowledge and assumptions that guided governments and public opinion at the time.

Those who wish to pursue specific subjects in the archives can best start by looking through the lists of titles of meetings and groups and names of speakers for the relevant years and then sampling the documents that seem most promising. The only subject index is a separate document concerning the War and Peace Studies. Broad titles sometimes conceal rather specialized discussions and vice versa. Some people will be more interesting than others but, except for speakers, one can only tell who was at which session by looking at the lists of participants included at the beginning of most, but not all, summaries. (Some of the lists are not complete.)

The notes that follow tell about the council and try to give a rough idea of what is to be found in the different categories of documents in the archives. The notes derive from the experience of attending quite a few of the sessions and writing some of the reports.

The Council on Foreign Relations and Its Work

The council was established shortly after the First World War. A key group of its founders were men who had been at the Versailles peace conference. Many of them were not happy with some of the things done there and the limited ability of the United States to bring about better results. They realized that for as far ahead as anyone could see the United States would have to take a major part in many international issues and to do that well would need a better-informed public, more specialists in a wide range of international matters, and better arrangements in the government to make use of improved sources of information and understanding than then existed. To help provide for these needs became the purpose of the council.

The people who came back from Paris joined forces with a group in New York made up largely of businessmen and bankers who had been holding dinner meetings to discuss the position of the United States in the world and to receive distinguished foreigners. Soon they began the three principal activities that have continued to make up the main part of the council's work. Meetings were organized at which Americans and foreigners gave talks to members of the council and then answered questions and engaged in discussion. To dig more deeply into important subjects the council launched a program of studies—research intended to lead to publications of high quality. To reach a wider public the council established Foreign Affairs, a quarterly journal whose independent editors have presented important articles by well-known and obscure people from all over the world since 1922. A fair number of Foreign Affairs articles had their origin in council meetings and studies, but the work of the quarterly is not included in these archives. The other two activities, however, are well covered by these records of talks by visitors, discussions in groups that were sometimes but not always linked with publications, and summaries of a number of conferences, domestic and international. The archives also include the work of the War and Peace Studies to which the council devoted a major part of its efforts during the Second World War.

Naturally the council's membership and its staff were crucial to the work recorded here. From the beginning a serious, and largely successful, effort was made to ensure that the membership (limited to American citizens and, during the period covered by the microfiche, to men) included a good mix of businessmen, academics, government officials and military officers, and journalists. Care was taken to keep the membership bipartisan; it was no accident that there were few extremists of left or right and that the proportion of isolationists was much lower than in many other organizations. The size of most sessions was limited, especially in groups where a sustained exchange of views was needed. Although groups were mostly made up of members, others were added when their help seemed needed, especially when a group was advising an author of a council publication.

The records on these microfiche were closed until 1975 when the council's board of directors decided to follow the practice of the U.S. government and open the accounts of meetings, groups, and conferences as they became twenty-five years old. Even then a living person could not be quoted or paraphrased without his written permission. American and foreign scholars have already made good use of much of the material. In permitting these early records to be put on microfiche the council has secured the assent of all those known to be alive and whom it could reach. (Since the other council archives which are not open include those of its Committee on Studies, there is no complete public account of why all of the work covered by these microfiche was undertaken, what other proposals were turned down, and why some studies were left unpublished).

These "digests of discussions"—to use the term generally applied to these records by the council—are rarely truly verbatim accounts. They are summaries made by members of the council staff or others. They vary in length and detail and also as to whether they identify individuals whose views are recorded. In some cases the digests were corrected by the participants, but this was not very common. In many cases the language reported is very close to what was actually said, but those using the records will have to judge this matter as best they can. Naturally, the digest writers often edited the proceedings for cogency. Occasionally a participant would ask that one of more statements not be taken down. No doubt there are some errors in these records and a few gaps, but there is sufficient evidence from the use that has been made of them by council staff and visiting scholars to indicate that they are for the most part very reliable.

Meetings

Some of the meetings recorded in the archives were attended by a substantial number of people, others by relatively few. The reports of the larger sessions are usually made up of a summary of the talk—or occasionally the prepared text if the speaker had one—followed by questions. Sometimes members raised challenging and contentious issues or tried to nail down some of the speaker's generalities or get at subjects he had passed over, but there are also some rather elementary and banal questions. Occasionally smaller dinners following afternoon talks permitted more thorough discussion. The roster of people for whom the council held meetings is long and striking. There are American statesmen, such as Herbert Hoover, Charles Evans Hughes, Henry L. Stimson, Cordell Hull, Lucius Clay, Nelson Rockefeller, and George Kennan. They are outnumbered by foreign visitors, including Georges Clemenceau, Alexander Kerensky, Eduard Benes, Hjalmar Schacht, Hu Shih, Ernest Bevin, Anthony Eden, Jan Christiaan Smuts, Jan Masaryk, Pierre Laval, Jawaharlal Nehru, Trygve Lie, Robert Schuman, Ernst Reuter, and several crowned heads. Sometimes there were meetings for journalists such as Walter Lippman, John Gunther, James Reston, and Walter Duranty. Throughout the period many of the council's guests were intellectual leaders of many stripes; one finds such names as Toynbee, Keynes, Laski, Salter, Coudenhove-Kalergi, Stolper, Ohlin, Myrdal, Viner, and Rueff.

At the smaller meetings, the visitors might be less prominent but the discussions often cut deeper. The council members invited usually had specialized knowledge; the subjects were more sharply focused and often related to council studies. Discussion leaders might be scholars or businessmen or, quite often, an American or foreign official at what is called (perhaps invidiously) "the working level" who was closer than his superiors to some complex problem and in private discussion could speak frankly about differences of opinion and other difficulties that had to be passed over in public. These smaller meetings often dealt with current issues but sometimes had broader subjects: "Problems of Capitalism" was both a large and timely subject in 1931.

Occasionally meetings were held in series. The longest, called "The Progress of the War," began on September 25, 1939, and ended on July 17, 1945. Most of the frequent sessions began with talks by Hanson Baldwin, the military and naval expert of the New York Times. Sometimes he was spelled by another military journalist, George Fielding Eliot, and once by Colonel William J. Donovan before he set up the OSS. Sometimes the people attending these sessions made information contributions; although the archives do not document the occasion, one participant recalls hearing Charles Lindbergh discuss the air war. (Unfortunately there are no digests of the discussions at these sessions). Sometimes a series took shape without initial design. To this day some of the participants recall as some of the best meetings they ever attended the nearly annual sessions during the time of the Marshall Plan with Robert Marjolin, the secretary general of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, a few of his key associates, and some especially knowledgeable Americans.

Not surprisingly, the council archives sometimes record unexpected turns of events. On November 28, 1942, a number of people came together to hear Wendell Willkie talk about his recent trip around the world. He spoke at some length, but what many saw as the high spot of the evening came when a member of the group challenged some of the criticisms Willkie had recently made of the American acceptance of Admiral Darlan's authority in North Africa and asserted that it had not been a political decision made in Washington but a measure taken by General Eisenhower on military grounds. Although the digest does not name the member of the group, his language and the attendance list make it easy to identify him as John J. McCloy, the assistant secretary of war, who seems to have come to the meetings primarily for this purpose—and elicited an interesting response from Willkie.

Groups

A council study or discussion group usually had one of three purposes: to advise someone who was making a study that the council hoped to publish, to explore an issue that might warrant future study, or simply to give members a chance to pursue their interests in a certain subject or keep up to date about events in some part of the world. The best way to find out which is which is to see what is said at the opening meeting or, if they are present, in the letters of invitation or preliminary memoranda by the council staff. As might be expected, not all original intentions were carried out. Work on one of the most fully documented groups begins in 1948 with some very thoughtful questions about the problems Western Europe will face at the end of the Marshall Plan. Later, efforts to find answers to those questions disappear, but, in the records of two years of sessions under the chairmanship of Dwight D. Eisenhower, some distinguishing and able people carry on interesting arguments about the current and future political, economic, and strategic problems of relations between the United States and Europe. The file also includes an account and documentation of some of the events leading up to General Eisenhower's departure from Columbia University to become the first commander of NATO forces.

An intriguing example of how these archives record the evolution of American thinking and attitudes can be found in the account of the work of the group that met in 1946 and 1947 on American relations with the Soviet Union. As the discussions proceed, major differences of opinion emerge about Soviet intentions and capabilities and what kinds of American actions are necessary. Not surprisingly, the idea of producing an agreed report had to be abandoned. Had there been a report it would have been an unusual case as council groups generally avoided such efforts. When groups were set up to consider manuscripts they were essentially advisory; the author took responsibility for what he said and the Committee on Studies decided if the resulting book should be published by the council. But those close to the process could usually see that, when it worked well, books gained a dimension from what the author had learned from the group's discussions. Naturally, present-day users will probably find it hard to form judgments on these matters.

Often manuscripts are not included in the microfiche; some books were written only after the meetings were over. Even in these cases, however, the group's discussions often tell a good bit about American attitudes and policies at the time. Both broad subjects and quite specialized issues are discussed. Europe, the Far East, and Latin America all receive a good bit of attention; sometimes individual countries provide the focus. In the 20s much was said about disarmament; in the early 30s there was a group on Philippine independence and later some on the rise of dictatorships and the problems of the Depression. In all periods there were many studies and discussions at the council of international trade, finance and investment; businessmen, scholars, and officials agree and disagree in lively fashion. The war aims of various countries and the problem of "winning the peace" were natural topics during the Second World War. Then and later the emergence of the salient features of a new kind of postwar world order can be traced very well. The broadened responsibilities of the United States and the increased interest of Americans in world affairs are reflected in postwar increases in the number of council groups and the widening of the range of subjects.

Conferences

During the period covered by these microfiche, the council had no clear-cut policy about conferences. The term itself was used to cover several quite different kinds of activity.

In the 30s there were several conferences intended to give members of the council time to discuss more fully than in group meetings some current issues, such as Far Eastern policy, the possibilities of national self-sufficiency, and world mineral issues (the subject of two early council books). A series of conferences on neutrality and American foreign economic policy brought to the council for the first time substantial numbers of what it called “university men”—graduate students, instructors, and college seniors. In 1946 a series of conferences in six cities attended largely by members of college faculties was an important part of a major council project concerning the future of teaching and research in international relations. Other subjects were the occasions for conferences in the 40s, including some of the work of the Hoover Commission on the organization of the government and several responding to a State Department request for advice on proposals for what became the Foreign Service Institute.

These archives do not cover the council’s prewar work as the American coordinating committee for the International Studies Conference that was meeting for the last time as the war broke out. Among the meetings and the work of groups covered by the other three sections of these notes there are records of some important wartime sessions that brought together council members and scholars and statesmen from other countries. It was not, however, until 1948 that the council had its first postwar conference with foreign institutes studying international relations. Those meetings, in Holland in 1947 and 1948, were attended by delegates from a number of European countries, Canada, and the United States to discuss postwar Germany. A follow-up in Bruges in 1955 added Germans to the groups for the first time. A conference on American-British relations in 1952 was very thoroughly prepared by two years of exchanges of documents between parallel study groups at the council and Chatham House (The Royal Institute of International Affairs, with which the council had long had close relations).

The 1952 and 1955 conferences—whose documents are included in the microfiche in spite of their dates—were the first of a number of conferences with one or more foreign institutes that later became an important part of council activities.

The War and Peace Studies

From 1940 to 1945 a large part of the council’s energy and resources went into the War and Peace Studies, a major effort to help prepare the United States to deal with problems of the postwar world better than it had coped with the issues raised at the Versailles conference and the international relations of the 20s and 30s. The extensive records of the work make up an important part of the microfiche of the council archives.

At the outset four groups were set up to consider, respectively, political, territorial, military (called at different times armaments and security), and economic and financial issues. Later a fifth group was created to consider the peace aims of other countries. This last group met with people from the governments-in-exile of occupied countries, opposition groups of various sorts from Germany and other countries, the Free French headed by General de Gaulle, and others. Some of the other groups met occasionally with British and Canadians, especially on economic matters, and there was some exchange of papers with people doing rather similar work at Chatham House—the council’s London counterpart. For the most part, however, the War and Peace groups concentrated on their own discussions and the preparation of papers on a large number of issues, great and small. Although the primary concern was with the shape of the postwar world, much discussion and many recommendations concerned wartime measures because it was clear to the experienced members of the group that current actions could open or close future opportunities.

The papers prepared by the groups, and the records of the discussions, were sent to the divisions in the State Department that were dealing with postwar problems. Sometimes the documents reached other parts of the government as well, either through State or because members of the groups worked there. Later some of the papers were revised for a larger, but limited, distribution. After the war sets of almost all of the papers were deposited in a number of college libraries and so have been widely available for a long time. This was not true, however, of the records of the discussion in the groups that were only released in 1975 along with the rest of the council archives included in these microfiche. Needless to say, these papers, which tell who said what, are especially interesting. The groups that were quite small and very hard working comprised leading scholars, thoughtful officials from the White House, and a few businessmen and lawyers. They often brought to the monthly sessions ideas and questions that were being considered—sometimes in great confidence—in other places, official and unofficial.

The War and Peace groups were in many ways comparable to other council groups but met more frequently and kept most of their membership over several years. Each had its own research secretary, members often wrote papers, sometimes outside studies were commissioned (which appear in a separate series of documents), and there was a good bit of cooperation among the groups. There was more emphasis on agreed documents than in other council work, but care was taken to avoid softening analyses or blunting recommendations; many papers were sent along because they threw light on a difficult problem and not because members agreed to them.

The biggest difference of all, however, was in the relations of the War and Peace work to the government. The State Department had given its blessing to the project at the outset, before there was any official work of the same sort. It received all the papers from all the groups. There was close liaison between the War and Peace work and the State Department officials, and some of the studies were made in response to official requests. Most of the research secretaries worked part-time for the State Department. Some of the key people in the War and Peace groups also sat on advisory committees in Washington or moved into government jobs as the war went on without dropping out of the council’s project. Both sides, however, drew some lines. No classified material was given to the council. No government money was involved; the work was financed by the Rockefeller Foundation. The council retained complete autonomy, which meant that the groups were entirely independent, not only in the conclusions reached but also in deciding what work to do.

Such close relations with the government are unique in council history. They seemed suitable to wartime conditions. It was thought they would help make the work more useful. It is doubtful if most of the sophisticated people engaged in this effort, who were well aware of the complex interplay of forces that made policy and determined action, had many illusions about how much influence their ideas might have. But they were bound to have hopes, and they felt sure that the work was worth undertaking.

That is largely true of the people responsible for the rest of the council's work over its whole life. Whether the view was sound is not something that can be judged by reading these documents, but that does not make them any less interesting.

The Council on Foreign Relations was founded in 1921 by businessmen, bankers, and lawyers determined to keep the United States engaged in the world. Today, the council comprises men and women from all walks of life and from all parts of the United States, dedicated to the belief that the nation's peace and prosperity are firmly linked to that of the rest of the world. From this flows the council's mission: to foster America's understanding of other nations—their peoples, cultures, histories, hopes, quarrels, and ambitions—and thus to serve the nation through study and debate, private and public.

This collection of Records of the Council on Foreign Relations, 1921–1951 reflects the depth of council members' knowledge concerning sensitive foreign relations issues. For example, a group exploring the question “Do Bases for Real Peace Exist between the U.S. and Japan?” met one month before the Pearl Harbor bombing. Issues relating to the economic rebuilding of Germany and Japan after World War II, European disarmament in the mid-1920s, political movements in other countries, and diplomatic assessments of America's standing in the world are among other subjects covered.

The documents contained in this collection provide an insightful record of 20th-century international relations. Eyewitness reports on conditions in political, economic, and military “hot spots” throughout the world will add depth to virtually any scholarly work on modern U.S. history. Periodic reports from nations as far-flung as Palestine, Germany, Japan, and the Soviet Union provide hard-to-find documentation of social changes in the modern histories of those nations.

Researchers at all levels will benefit from the viewpoints offered on the three tumultuous decades between 1921 and 1951, as seen by those involved in making history as well as those involved in recording it.
